Future Possibilities In Air Defense Preparations

By HAROLD MORRISON
Canadian Press Staff Writer
MONTREAL (CP) — Canada within 10 years likely will have an advanced form of "push button" air defence, involving installation of a new $2,000,000,000 "electronic atmosphere" electronics producer K.F. Patrick predicted today.
This "atmosphere" will gather signals from all the radar warning systems now being installed "plus many more" and will channel them into a giant computer. Once an enemy plane crosses a radar link the computer, acting on a signal, will automatically instruct a guided missile, interceptor aircraft or other weapon "along precise lines."
Group Capt. Patrick, president of Canadian Aviation Electronics Limited, said the three big Canadian radar systems, the PineTree along the Canada-U.S. border, the Mid-Canada and the distant early warning DEW line in the northern reaches will tend to grow and will be "completely integrated on both a north-south and east-west basis in the next five to 10 years."
"A system which is becoming known as SAGE — semi-Automatic Ground Environment — now is being developed as a means of creating an electronic atmosphere for all of North America," he told the Gordon economic commission. FABULOUS FUTURE
Group Capt. Patrick, who helped develop radar for Canada, Britain and the United States during the Second World War, said the electronics industry will open a fabulous future for Canadians in every walk of life.

But he warned that because of the fundamental nature of electronics there is evidence of a massive international "struggle for control" among corporations all over the world. There were dangers, he said, of the growing practices of the U. S. of funneling management of large electronics defence contracts into the hands of a single company. This was apt to foster "monopoly operations."
To build up the Canadian electronics system, the federal government should promote a "buy-in Canada policy." The industry needs government contracts on a continuing and planned basis. Government credit should be provided to sell electronics parts to non-colonial countries.
Excise taxes on radio and television sets should be eliminated to promote more sales. Greater federal tax credits should be allowed on money spent on electronics research. NEED ENGINEERS
There was a great need in Canada, Group Capt. Patrick said, for more engineers. To few were trained in Canada and the loss in emigration to the U. S. "compounds an already desperate situation."
The electronics industry will grow, he said, and will bring automation.
"Automation, in our opinion, will not cause unemployment as is feared in some quarters although there is bound to be a gradual readjustment," he said.
The five-man Gordon commission will open a round-up of final national hearings in Ottawa Monday. They will run about two weeks after which the travel-weary commissioners who have held sessions from coast to coast will start preparing their report on Canada's economic future. The report is to be ready by the year-end.
