was too late, though she would have said yes had I proposed first. She also hinted quite plainly that hurt vanity, not love, was back of my sudden urge to make things right.

I feel certain she still loves me and I would have gone through with marriage, though naturally I would have felt trapped.

In my mind, I feel I still love her. In the past I never felt matrimonially inclined toward her; nor did I miss her much during recent months of separation; but now I feel very depressed in general.

It is an impossible situation. I would like to erase her image from my life, since nothing can be done about it. What chance has her marriage, with her being still in love with me? I have talked with her once and she seems a bit unhappy about the whole business, as if sorry she had married the man.

But I am sure she will stick to the marriage and try to make it work, though her health isn't robust and I am worried that she may get sick over this thing. What book can I read that might explain my sudden desire for her? Sincerely yours, T.G.

Dear T.G.: Three cheers for the widow. In marrying the widower, she has escaped the quicksands of neurosis in which she had been floundering with you, and got back on the solid ground of normal wholesome companionship with a healthy minded man, who believes in living and loving responsibly.

If she still seems a bit unhappy about the whole business of her former romance with you and eventual escape to a better deal with a better man, I would surmise that her melancholy air on that subject—is simply a passing reaction to your characteristic sport-personality.

Just to be in your cold hearted presence is dispiriting to her no doubt, due to the discouragement, frustration, humiliation, loss of self esteem, etc., that you represent in her memory book.

Disassociated from you as she is, enveloped in the reassurance of married teamwork, once again a full citizen of society—couples, with scant use for loners—she probably is more solidly happy today than at any time since her path crossed you.

You are committed, as usual, to disengagement; to selfishness, aloneness, to no strings attached. That's why you feel so depressed since Jane got married. It is because you feel convinced that nobody cares very much, one way or another, about where you are or what you are doing these days. And you're probably right. Such is the basis of your sudden desire for Jane.

The remedy for your isolation is to grow up, fledge out, become fully human and adult, and enlist (as it were) in the human family. Do yourself a favor and read C.S. Lewis' book "Mere Christianity" (MacMillan Paperbacks, $1.25), a collection of talks he made over BBC. It will help you to grasp the meaning of your existence, and give you perspective on truths you need to know. —M.H.

ELLEN'S DIARY

Peter Delights Family By Taking First Steps

January has been kind, so far, to the folks of this farm, in that, with only the odd day excepted, our machines have been able to ply to and from the yards. Last winter—but "Let's not think of last winter!" one commented today with a wry chuckle at the memories of its towering drifts—the little truck which attends to the farm's varied bidings must take on its passengers mostly at lane's end. Visitors too must park their cars there, and come and go the rest of the way on foot. Comfortably now folks can come to our doors. Tonight it was Jamie, eldest grandson of the name, and Elva his wife and their babe who came by, to be at home with us about our hearthfire. —And James pleased always with children and inclined to err in kindness and leniency toward them, smiled down at the little lad when he held him in his arms in the old armchair. Wondering, we suspected, whether or not he would be one to one day take an interest in the farming; to be pleased with the

Japanese Girls Model Fashions In Western Style

TOKYO (Reuters) — Fashion modelling is becoming an increasingly popular profession among young Japanese girls. The trend developed after the war when Western-style fashions began to replace the traditional kimono for Japanese women. Now 80 per cent of fashions displayed here are Western-style creations. Magazines, department stores, television and films all stress Western-style dress, leaving the kimono for festive occasions, such as weddings or New Year celebrations. The Japanese miss of 1962 now is able to compete with her Western cousin in fashionable skirts, blouses, sweaters, jeans, shoes and slacks. Five agencies for fashion models have been approved by the ministry of labor in Tokyo and together they handle about 400 models. One group deals exclusively with male models. GOOD MONEY — Tokyo's leading weekly and monthly magazines offer the models a wide field of employment. The manager of one agency said the girls work hard—about 12 hours a day—but earn good money. Her leading girls can earn up to 100,000 yen ($200) a month—a high salary in Japan. Models working for the major agencies must be slim and between five-foot-three and five-foot-four. The weekly magazine Bunko reports there are about 1,000 models in Japan but only the top 30 are paid high wages. The magazine said the top 10 might earn 300,000 yen ($600) a month. Next come a group of about 20 who earn between 100,000 yen and 150,000 yen ($200 to $250) a month. The majority of the rest live on small incomes from occasional modelling for fashion shows, magazines or amateur cameramen's photographic competitions.
