The bidding: North East South West
1♣ Pass 1♥ 1♠
2♠ Pass 2♥ 2♠

Opening lead—four of clubs.

This hand comes from a rubber bridge game witnessed by this writer. It shows how declarer can put to use information obtained from the bidding by the opponents.

It must be granted it is tempting for West to double four hearts. There is some question, though, that he should have gotten up out of his chair to do so. The double wasn't that good. But double West did, and South's play was based largely on the information obtained thereby.

West led a club. It seemed to declarer that the club was likely to be a singleton, dummy having bid the suit twice. South won with the queen, and in his anxiety to prevent a club ruff, immediately tackled trumps without bothering to go to dummy to take the possible trump finesse.

When he led the ace of hearts, East showed out. Declarer continued with a low heart and West went up with the king, knowing that South would finesse the eight if the heart was ducked. Furthermore, West was anxious to lock declarer in dummy, and therefore returned a heart after taking the king.

Declarer toyed with the idea of leading the queen of spades to drive out the ace, which would permit him to get to his hand, extract West's only trump, and then run the club suit. But since West could not be compelled to take the queen with the ace, South abandoned the idea.

Instead, he led the king of diamonds. (If he had led a low diamond, East could win it with the queen, return a club, and defeat the contract forthwith.)

The bell tolled. The best West could do now was to take the ace, cash the ace of spades and call it a day, allowing declarer to make four hearts doubled.

But a peculiar twist took place. West was so intent on preventing declarer from getting to his hand—he did not know East had the queen—that he ducked the king of diamonds. The grateful declarer ruffed a diamond, drew West's trump, ran the clubs, and wound up making five hearts.
