FLORABEL'S LOVER

He walked into the reading room of the hotel, and threw himself down into an arm chair near the window. A young man sat opposite him, glancing eagerly down the columns of a newspaper.

His face seemed to attract Gerald Thorndyke strangely at the first glance. Feeling intuitively the deep scrutiny of the prolonged gaze bent upon him, the young man dropped the paper nervously and turned hastily away.

"Why should he do that?" thought Thorndyke, picking up a paper and pretending to be absorbed in its columns. "There is something wrong there, I feel sure. That fellow will bear watching."

Twice the young man rose from his seat and paced up and down the floor of the reading room, eagerly watching the great bronze clock on the wall.

Several strangers entered the room, and Gerald Thorndyke saw him glance keenly, and with repressed uneasiness and agitation, very carefully at each and every one; and as they looked at him indifferently and passed by, he turned away in apparent relief.

As the porter passed by the door he beckoned to him.

"Has my baggage been taken down from my room yet?" he asked, hesitatingly.

"Not yet, sir," returned the man. "You are to take the 8:45 train. It is only 8:15 now. You have plenty of time."

The young man resumed his seat and his paper.

"I shall never feel safe until I have put considerable distance between New York and me," he muttered.

At that instant one of the bell-boys stepped into the room, holding a telegram in his hand.

"Is Mr. Arthur Hurlhurst here?" he asked, glancing quickly among the different groups of gentlemen. "A telegram for him."

The young man sprang to his feet and held out his hand for it, saying, in a constrained voice:

"This way, my lad. I am Arthur Hurlhurst."

...his feet, he could not have been more startled. Could it be possible that the man who was looking for—
...him such a world of woe—
...his grasp? In an instant he made up his mind what course to take. He would detain him until Mr. Forrester could be sent for.

Approaching him, Gerald opened a conversation with him with great care, taking the precaution of sending a special messenger in great haste for Max.

Gerald Thorndyke knew so well how to make himself a "thoroughly good fellow," as his companions expressed it, that he quite charmed Arthur.

"I am sorry I did not meet you before," he said, rising to leave the reading room. "I leave New York to-day. I shall have to bid you good-bye now."

There was a quick, ringing step outside; some one burst into the room with a bound; and before Arthur Hurlhurst could wheel about, a hand like a grip of iron fell on his shoulder, and a hoarse voice—which he knew but too well—fell hoarsely on his ear, crying out:

"I have tracked you down at last, you villain! Most any other man would shoot you down on the spot; but I will give you an equal chance with me for your life. But I will have this accursed affair cleared up first. Answer me! Where is Florabel?"

Arthur Hurlhurst attempted to shake himself free, but the grasp on his shoulder was as firm as a band of steel. Much to Max Forrester's amazement, the brown eyes of the young man met his unflinchingly.

"Upon my honor, I answer you candidly, I do not know," he replied, calmly.

"Tell me on the spot, or I will not be accountable for what may happen after; what is Florabel to you?"

It almost killed Max Forrester to utter these words; but he must know the truth.

"I may as well make a clean breast of it," said Arthur, frankly, "and throw myself upon your mercy. Excuse will not avail. I see you are in for hearing the whole truth."

"Yes," said Max, hoarsely, "I will have the truth."

"What I have to say shall never be told before a third party," said Arthur, proudly.

"You can retire, Gerald," said Max. "I will deal with this fellow alone."

"Now, then, speak out quickly," cried Max, harshly. "Answer my question at once."

"I am Florabel's brother," replied Arthur, slowly. "This I swear to you. But before I explain further, you must give me your solemn promise that you will not reveal what I am about to tell you to any living person, for upon this strange point hangs what seems to you poor little Florabel's unaccountable actions."

Max Forrester dropped back as though he had been shot.

"Florabel's brother!" he gasped. "Impossible! How dare you tell me this? She has no brother."

"I am her brother—her miserable, unhappy, worthless brother," responded Arthur, sadly. "I wish to Heaven I had never made myself known to the poor girl, to have brought all this misery upon her. If you were not blind, Forrester, you could trace in my face the relationship. It does not admit of doubting."

Ah, yes! Here were the same hazel eyes, the sweet mouth, the crinkled, golden, curly hair; the same trick of cresting the head backward. Yes, yes, he must believe the truth. This was certainly Florabel's brother.

Gladly he gave the required promise.

His excitement was so great he scarcely breathed as he listened to Arthur Hurlhurst's, or rather Arthur Dean's, recital of the life he had led. Hunted down for crime, how he had

Are You Bilious?

A sluggish liver fails to filter the bile from the blood, and when the poisonous matter goes through the body in the circulation, the whole system is tainted and deranged. This is called biliousness and can be completely cured by Dr. A. W. Chase's Kidney-Liver Pills, which act directly on the liver making it healthy and active. One pill a dose, 25 cents a box. met Florabel, recognizing her instantly as his sister and how he had made the fact known to her when she met him, at his earnest request, in the rose arbor.

"Oh, how much misery might have been spared if Florabel had but told me," groaned Max, burying his face in his shaking hands.

"The poor child believed you would leave her if you knew her to be the daughter of a criminal and the sister of a forger," replied Arthur; "and on her knees she begged me to keep all knowledge of that from you, although she wanted to tell you I was her brother. But this I made her take a solemn vow not to do, for I dreaded lest, with your fine notions of honor, you would hand me over to the authorities."

"I bade her good-bye and left her. The next thing I knew she came on to New York to me, telling me, with sobs and tears, of your cruel suspicions, and begging me to go back with her and set the matter straight. I put the poor child off from week to week, for, as I said before, I feared lest you would give me up to the authorities if you knew all, and it would be sure to come out."

Then, with face flushing and paling with shame, he told the story of the diamonds which he had taken from Florabel, and not being bold enough to face her, had deserted her, leaving her alone, penniless, in the large, strange city.

Max Forrester's emotion was so great he could hardly withhold his terrible wrath at this point, on listening to the pitiful desertion of poor, beautiful, hapless Florabel, his wronged, innocent darling.

"From the hour in which I left her to take out the diamonds to sell I have not looked upon her face," concluded Arthur.

A Frenchman Finds Canadian

Weather Had a Bad Effect on His Health

St. ESTACHE, Que., Feb. 12.—Auguste Du Bois landed here from France, a perfect stranger to the weather conditions prevailing in this country. The food also differed from that to which he had been accustomed, and his heart being weak, the change had a serious effect upon it. He went to a medical man who did him no good. He went to others with a similar result in each case.

"I had to go to Montreal," he says, "to work for the Grand Trunk in that city and met a man who was suffering the same as myself, but had started to take Dodd's Kidney Pills. He told me they were doing him good. He was kind enough to give me a few of them. I took them. I felt much better. I procured a box, and in fifteen days felt like a different man."
