Island Farms Revived By Showers Of Rain

And it came toward week-end: the weather island farmers had been wishing. Indeed longing for, of late to bless their sowings and plantings. When, in the continuing dryness, clouds of dust marked the rounds of cultivator and seeder, folks remarked somewhat despairingly, "We just may get another dry spring and summer. They do sometimes follow that way." And farmers' searching the bright sky for a rain cloud and watching sunsets and wis, and swallows' flights, and the night-sky for a sign, turned away disappointed. Yet because of an age-old promise in regard to seed-time and harvest, they went on with the rites of the former. And in time the damp came. Their fields received the life giving wash for which they had hoped in thoughts which prayerful.

"Who can estimate its value!" James queried more to himself than us, looking out at the silvery slant of a heavy shower between this and the house on the hill. "Now if sunshine and warmth follows, things will grow," he smiled.

"I never saw fields improve show more growth than they have since the rain," a visiting farmer offered today.

"The clover wasn't giving much promise before this. Now it shows," James nodded.

"And the green of the grass! I never saw it a healthier shade for the time of year. Why overnight, we could hardly see it made growth!"

"We just may get a good 'growing' summer," James said.

"And today a little wind stirred first green wavelets in the grasses where the cattle-kind grazed, and dandelions danced. And the ewes nibbled in the orchard, and stopped with motherly instinct while babies nursed, and altogether sensed, we could fancy, these were among their happiest days.

"Our farmers sowed grain in fields at the other farm, there where an old orchard will presently blossom, and one can find an interesting fringe of feathers jingling down by the stream. If we came today to a higher vantage point to look up for the next meeting.
