

Winning Mates in Argentine's Presidential Election

PRESIDENT PERON

EVA PERON

President Juan D. Peron of the Argentine, and his pretty blonde wife, Eva, will be running mates in Nov. 11 presidential elections...

Address and Presentation

On Monday evening, July 30th, a large number of people from New Haven and vicinity gathered at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Brewer Boyle to honour their son, Everett, on his recent marriage...

Mr. Lloyd MacPhail in his usual capable manner performed the duty of chairman. After his remarks he called upon Miss Bernice Gass with a well-addressed and Miss Thelma Willis presented them with a red-filled purse...

With All My Love

(By Virginia Bowes)

Clare's face was flaming red as she spun around under Clay Hanley's grip. "Keep your dirty hands off me!" she cried, her voice ringing hard with bitterness...

"You're not at home now, Miss Calridge," he said caustically. "And you're not ordering around a staff of servants. When you're out here I'm the boss, remember that. Incidentally, you won't get a lesson today. You missed your 9 o'clock appointment and I have no other time open."

Clare scoffed. "You'll have plenty of time on your hands before this is over," she said. "You may not know it but you're just about through." She didn't know exactly why she said that, but she had to say something and automatically she expressed her most emphatic hope.

Hanley laughed, but there was no humor in the sound. His shoulders tensed and his strong jaw shot forward aggressively. "Don't threaten me, baby," he said. "I don't like it, and anyway it doesn't mean anything. Your old man is not going to pay any attention to what you say when I have something that means money in the pocket for him."

If only you knew how wrong you were about that, Clare thought. But she didn't say a word. She glared at him for a moment with mounting irritation at the way his eyes roved insolently over her slim figure, all the way from the brown saddle shoes and ankle socks to the yellow spirts dress and matching, wide-brimmed crown hat that crested her soft blonde hair.

And finally, afraid she might say more than she wanted to, she turned abruptly and went back to the car. She drove down into town, a terrific feeling of let-down weighing upon her. Here in her purse she had exactly the evidence that Eddie Franklin had long suspected existed; the evidence that Roger Caswell had been the author of the plans Clay Hanley had applied to his new plane. Eddie was sure that no other plane designer had ever conceived the idea of hydraulic balances for the shifting of a plane's center of gravity; he was sure that Roger Caswell was the real inventor of the amazing technique.

Even Roger, in all his trusting innocence thought, must have suspected Hanley's motives toward the end. Why, otherwise, would he have so carefully concealed the plans in the last place in the world anyone would look for them—in the back of a picture frame?

Of course there still was nothing to prove that Clay Hanley had taken part in the plan that sent Roger to his death and that was what Eddie wanted to prove. But this was surely something...

The anger she had felt in her meeting with Clay still persisted and she had a sudden impulse to her watch; it was nearly 12 o'clock. She was on Main street within a couple of blocks of the bank building and she stopped at a drugstore to call.

"How about lunch today, Betty?" she asked when she got the other girl on the phone. "Oh—why yes, Clare. That will be nice. Shall I meet you at the tearoom?"

"Yes, I'm on my way there now. I'll be there in five minutes." There was a new note in Betty's voice, less of surprise and more of grimace. "We have a lot to talk about, Clare. I'll see you in a few minutes." Then she hung up.

Clare had a suspicion even before they were together at the table as to what was on Betty's mind. She had almost forgotten that her car had been left at the airport by Eddie Franklin the night before—for Betty's benefit—and then returned to the garage. She was sure suddenly, that Betty had seen it and she waited expectantly for the opening gun.

"You wouldn't be trying to cut in on me, would you, Clare?" Betty said this a moment after they were seated. There was a tight little smile around her wide, rouged lips, and her dark eyes held a quiet malice as she looked pleadingly at Clare.

"What do you mean?" Clare replied, not caring that the question was ridiculous. Betty looked at her contemptuously. "You'll never grow up, will you, Clare? You know perfectly well what I mean. I mean Clay Hanley."

Tips on Outdoor

Continued from page 2 adds a cheerful touch and it is easily cleaned if things are spilled on it. No one ever remembers to take along steel wool pads, but they do make it so easy to scour picnic pots and pans.

Sweetest Music Is there any music sweeter as the "come and get it" melody around a barbecue grill? Whether it's an elaborate barbecue fire-place in the back yard or a camp fire in the country, everyone is sure to have a big appetite, so have plenty of good food. Once Mrs. Home-maker has taken stock of her equipment she may then plan her menu accordingly. She may plan to have chicken, which may be purchased as cut up chicken or broilers, all cleaned and ready for use, at the market. The broilers should be cut in halves or quarters for ease in grilling. Barbecued spareribs have that special barbecue tang that calls for more. To keep happy budget-wise, hamburger, Wieners, Bologna, luncheon meats or sausages may be used. To many families the favourite barbecue food is hamburgers. They can be fixed in a variety of delicious ways to suit any number of tastes. The home economists suggest that you start with good quality beef in order to have the best results. For those who like ground meat, shape well-seasoned ground meat into patties. Place over hot coals and grill until done. Serve on toasted buns.

There are many other 'burger favourites. Relish burgers may be made by merely mixing drained relish into the patty before cooking. A generous helping may be placed on the top of the patty just before it is slipped into the bun. Mushrooms may be chopped and mixed into the ground beef for an appetizing mushroom burger. A little tangy cheese gives added flavor. Top the burger with cheese and cook for a few minutes until the cheese melts.

For devilled hamburgers lightly toss ground beef with catsup, horseradish sauce, minced onion, Worcestershire sauce and mustard. Let everyone dress his own hamburger. Put barbecue sauce, mustard, cole slaw, onions, cheese slices, tomato slices and relish on the picnic table and let everyone serve themselves.

Then for the vegetables, corn is almost a "must." It may be either boiled or wrapped in foil and thrust into the coals, or everyone may roast his own over the fire using a long stick or skewer. Serve it hot and dripping with butter. Potatoes, too, may be boiled or wrapped in foil, and thrust into the coals. Of course, no meal is complete without a salad. A crisp tossed salad will please everyone.

For dessert, pies, turnovers or fresh fruits are excellent. Picnics are always fun but don't let your good time make you forgetful. Always check and double check the fire before you leave to see that it is out.

Ernest Sardo, of Elmira, N. Y., and a triple amputee, the result of service in the Second World War, went into the frozen custard business and now earns over $14,000 a year.

And Bob Alput of Malone, N. Y., makes good money by making nylon boats. That's what comes of trying something that has never been tried before.

Strange But True

By F. H. MacArthur

There are plenty of reliable records of ships being sunk by whales. Here are a few: On August 20, 1856, the New Bedford whaler, Ann Alexander, was sunk by a sperm whale after the monster had been harpooned. Five months later the New Bedford whaler Rebecca Sims captured a whale with pieces of the ship's timber embedded in its head and two of the Ann Alexander's irons in its body.

The sinking of the Nantucket whaler Essex by an enraged whale is well known in shipping history as to have almost become a classic of the sea.

Early in the last century a Nantucket whaler was off the Rio de la Plata cruising for sperm whales. Her captain sighted a large Cachalot, which he reckoned to be a 90-pound bull. When the crew got close enough for the harpoonist to drive home his iron the sea creature turned and literally bit the boat in two by its powerful jaws.

Milk is heavier than cream. The cream rises to the surface, in fact, because it is composed of tiny drops of oil and fat that are lighter than the rest of the milk.

One out of every four Canadian doctors dies from heart disease, or heart arteries, a common cause of death among professional men.

A quick-witted medico recently saved the life of a woman patient in a London hospital when an internal hemorrhage and stagnant blood threatened her life. The doctor took a 100 to 1 chance, drained three pints of blood from his own body, strained it through gauze to eliminate clots and then injected it into her arm. It worked and the patient lived.

A nurse with a pleasant voice and a light footstep is a helpful factor in the treatment of illness.

Be of good cheer: Medical records reveal that it's possible for a victim of high blood pressure to live to be a hundred years old.

The average Canadian family pays about $100 every two years for medical and hospital services.

DEAR MISS DIX: I am 25 and attending high school. Last summer I met a boy 21 years old and have been going with him ever since. My parents don't know about it. Now he has gone to Europe for the summer, and his best friend has asked me for a date. Should I accept?

ANSWER: First of all, don't go on any dates that your parents don't know about. You have been doing a very sneaky thing, and no nice boy would have taken you out without your parents' permission. Your mother is the one to consult on your problem. Go to her as soon as possible.
