

POETRY.

NEW NEIGHBORS.

Within the window's scant recess, Behind a pink geranium flower, She sits and sews and sews and sits, From patient hour to patient hour.

As woman-like as marble is, As woman-like as death might be— A marble death condemned, to make A feat of life perpetually.

Wondering, I watch to pity her; Wondering, I go to restless ways, Content, I think the untamed thoughts Of free and solitary days.

Until the mournful dusk begins To drop upon the quiet street, Until upon the pavement fair There falls the sound of coming feet.

The sound of happy, hastening feet, Tender as kisses of the air— Quicken as if touched by unseen lips, Blushes the little statue there.

And woman-like as young life is, And woman-like as joy may be, Tender with color, little with love, She starts, transfused gloriously.

Superb in one transcendent glance— Her eyes are burning black— My little neighbor, smiling, turns And throws my unasked pity back.

I wonder it is worth the while To sit and sew from hour to hour, To sit and sew with eyes of black Behind a pink geranium flower.

LITERATURE.

BURIED ALIVE.

As she to ashes, dust to dust, repeated the solemn voice of the minister. The service concluded, each one in turn pressed forward to take one last look at the beautiful occupant in the rosewood casket, which seemed a bed of the loveliest flowers.

Beautiful in death as in life, for no lingering disease of sickness had wasted the flesh or dimmed the glorious, almost seraphic beauty of the little we image so soon to be hidden from their sight in the bosom of the cold motherly earth.

Belle Eberlie, seven years of age, only and idolized child of Isabel and Earle Eberlie, rich and influential citizens of Boston, had died suddenly, the doctors had all agreed.

A sweet, gentle smile illuminated the childish face, the long golden curls swept over and completely covered the satin pillow, falling in spiral glittering masses to her waist, her dress of delicate blue silk was almost hidden by flowers; round her fair white throat glittered a heavy gold chain to which was attached a locket studded with small diamonds, and on one tiny finger flashed another of the precious gems.

Her fond and distracted mother insisted she should wear, though many friends expostulated, saying that a temptation it would be to many, and how dangerous it seemed to them, but all they said was of no avail, and the mother had her way.

All had taken their last look and wept their good-bye, all except the bereaved parents. Their friends and neighbors had stepped aside in kind consideration, and Earle Eberlie led forward his trembling, heart-broken wife to gaze once more on her child, her only one, but she broke wildly from his encircling arms, and raising her burning eyes and clenched hands to heaven, shrieked—

"Can God best create? Oh, my babe, my blessed child, I cannot spare you!" and fell senseless on the floor by the side of the coffin of her child, without a kiss or a last good-bye. They raised her pityingly. The casket lid was closed. Ah! why could not that kiss have been given? How much misery would have been spared. Then the casket had never been closed. It was lowered; the earth and stones began to rattle on it and all was over.

The broken-hearted man carried his wife back to the carriage where she began to recover slowly. He strove to lay aside his own great grief to comfort hers.

Arrived at home—to his own desolate home—where no little pattering feet would run to meet them, no red lips be raised for the ever welcome kiss, no silver voice again be heard. Grief and distraction followed, and for two long weeks life and death strove for the mastery. Life won the day, and the fair young mother awoke to the full realization of her sad loss, a more shadow of her former self.

A thankful boon to her was life; rather had she chosen death and reunion with her beloved child, than life and separation, for grief makes us selfish sometimes. No thought of the fond and faithful heart which had suffered and wept with her, had she until a month had passed. Then she did indeed notice the lingering step, then she awoke from her lethargy.

Her awakened fears did more to dispel her useless grief than years could accomplish. She asked him if he was sick; she knew he was heart-sick and weary—mentally sick if not bodily.

In her fear she consulted the physician. He ordered change of air, bade him travel. So after a few days' preparation they started for Europe where they stayed for a year, reaching home in December, restored in health, but with an aching void in her heart that nothing earthly could fill.

It is a delightful morning in winter. Mrs. Eberlie reclines in an easy chair, gazing upon a miniature of her lost darling; the door bell rings, she rises with a mournful smile as a fresh and blooming lady enters, bringing with her wafts of keen and frosty air, into the summer warmth of the apartment. They exchanged greetings warmly.

"Oh, Isabel, dear, I want you to do me a favor. Put on your hat and cloak and come with me; my cutter is at the door. I will tell you my story as we go along."

Isabel was soon equipped and they were driving along at a delightful speed. "You know, my dear Isabel, I have always wanted to adopt a child, as God has seen fit to deny me any of my own, but Edward has always been averse to it till to-day. Tomorrow you know is Christmas day, and I, as I asked me what I would like best—told me to choose anything I wanted and I would have it. So I of course asked him to let me go to the orphan asylum and take a little one to adopt, and do you believe he agreed right off, and oh! I am happy. But what's the matter? Oh dear, I forgot, how selfish I am, dear, don't cry please, say more."

"Oh, dear father, how I do thank thee! Am I mad, or dreaming? Can I believe my eyes? Do I deserve such supreme happiness? My darling, Oh, madam where did you get her—how did she come here?"

"She was brought here one dark night, marm, and left on the steps. She had a note very poorly written, saying she might be called for at any time, and begging us to keep her although she was not an orphan. This is the reason we spared those long curls which are a great bother, marm, begging your pardon. The little thing did nothing but cry for her mother at first, but latterly she grew very quiet, as though she was sleepy. She has been a good, quiet child and we all loved her. But I am glad you have come, for I was afraid she was going to get bad in the head like."

"My poor baby, mother has come and you are safe. Get me her bonnet and cloak—here take my purse it will partly repay you for your kindness. Come, my angel, let me take you home and lighten the load from off your poor father's heart. I am almost too happy. We will enquire into your miraculous escape later."

Arrived at home all was commotion. The servants half frightened, wholly delighted. Ada for the time had forgotten her own mission. The father had not yet returned from his business. Isabel, lovingly and tenderly, with many a passionate, loving caress, bathed the lovely lion, combed and brushed the rich golden hair, and then rebid her darling in some of the treasured clothes, which had often been mistreated by her tears.

When all had been done that a mother's heart could prompt for the comfort of her returned treasure, she took her in her arms and for an hour of supreme joy, she held her in her lap and listened to all the child could tell of her recovery, which was little enough.

"When I awoke, mamma, I found myself in a very poor room, with two men and a woman. I had on a horrid dress, an old shawl and a bonnet. Soon the men took me in a cart and left me on some steps, and told me to stay there till they took me in. They gave me a letter and drove away. Oh! I was so frightened out thro' alive, but at last some one came and took me in, and was so kind. But oh, I wanted you! Don't let me go away again, mamma, will you?" she cried, clasping her arms around her mother's neck.

"No, no, darling, my treasure, my God-forsaken child, I'll never let you go. Behind those curtains, and do not stir till I shall call thee. "Oh, Earle, darling," she cried, rushing up to him and throwing herself on his bosom. "I have such a glorious Christmas present for you," her eyes blinding with wild excitement.

"Isabel, are you wild," he sadly asked, have you forgotten yourself?" "No darling, but I am almost wild. I have something to tell you, but I don't know how to break our happiness to you. Earle, darling, can you bear a great joy as well as some of a great sorrow?"

"Don't torture me Isabel, you are my only joy, and I do not want to think I am going to lose you, your eyes fairly blaze." "Oh, won't you understand me, Earle? Our child—our Belle is—"

THE ROYAL VISIT TO INDIA. ENTHUSIASTIC RECEPTION OF THE PRINCE—OVER TWO HUNDRED THOUSAND VISITORS.

General Lord Napier of Magdala, Sir Philip E. Wodehouse, Chief of Bombay, Hon. Sir M. Westropp, Governor of Bombay, and others, including the civil, military, and municipal authorities, accompanied by seventy native princes and chiefs, met and welcomed the Prince of Wales on his landing at the Sorapis. After leaving the royal barge at the Dockyard, the Municipality of Bombay presented him with an appropriate address of welcome. The Prince replied briefly, after which he and his suite were escorted to Government House. The troops and police preserved perfect order, while the long procession moved along the streets. Over 200,000 spectators lined the route. The description of the most enthusiastic description, and was participated in alike by Europeans and natives. The city was splendidly decorated throughout, no fewer than eight triumphal arches being raised on the line of march. The apartments to which he stayed in Bombay are the most pleasantly situated in Government House. A grand levee will be given there to-night. It is expected that while here the Prince will present colours to the 21st Native Infantry, better known as the Marine Battalion, the eldest corps in the Bombay establishment, being raised a century ago. He will also review the troops and accept the hospitality of the freemen of the city. To-morrow being the birthday of the Prince, the festivities will be renewed on a still greater scale. The British flying squadron is anchored in the harbor, and will remain during the stay of the Prince.

A PERFECTLY JUSTIFIABLE SCHEME—Isabel ever justifiable? A Pittsburgh paper says that a melancholy case of self-murder occurred on Sunday, near Titusville, Pennsylvania. The following schedule of misfortune was found in the house of the deceased, a married woman who had grown up daughter. My father visited our house very often, and in love with my step-daughter and married her, so my father became my son-in-law, and my mother-in-law. My father's wife, I, a great daughter, had also a son; he was of course my brother, and in the meantime my grandchild, for he was the son of my daughter. My wife was my grandchild because she was my mother. I was my wife's husband and grandchild at the same time. And as the husband of a person's grandmother is his grandfather, I was my own grandfather.

In the course of a lecture delivered some time ago by Mrs. Elizabeth Daily Stanton on the subject of "The Rights of Women," she related a rather quaint anecdote concerning the last mentioned of the distinguished trio, the verisimilitude, if not the truth, of which may easily be admitted. On the occasion of a dinner party given at the house of John T. Tremont, it fell to Mrs. Stanton's lot to be in charge of Mr. Greeley, who was to conduct her to dinner. She requested to wait until the rest of the party had passed on before she had something to communicate to him. He assented, and when they were left alone she proceeded to make his toilet, cap, etc., much, no doubt, to the great amusement of the guests. In the meantime she was carefully combing, and ending with his shoes which she gracefully did. "How is it," she then asked, "that a gentleman, so handsome as you are, Mr. Greeley, are so careless of your dress?" to which all the reply he made was "Handsome is that handsome does."

HOW A MUSLIMAN EXPECTS TO GO TO PARADISE—An execution attended by curious circumstances, has taken place at Timenon, Akko, Syria. The criminal was Arad, a son of Siben Ali Ould si Habbet ben Monsour, who descended from a family of venerable Marabouts, and had been condemned to death for murdering an Arab native woman. He protested his innocence to the last, and refused to have anything to do with the Mussulman priests that was sent to shrieve him. Only one thing troubled him. According to ancient belief, the body of a man who dies in the execution was carried out in the usual style, in the midst of a large concourse of natives. The family of the deceased then approached the gallows, took possession of the head and body, placed them in a coffin, and carried them home. In the evening the remains were buried according to Mussulman rites, and the ceremony was attended by several hundred men and women, who made the night hideous with their shouts and lamentations.

From the Missouri Republican (St. Louis). A REMARKABLE PROFESSIONAL SUCCESS. Among the notable professional men of this country who have achieved extraordinary success in the profession of medicine, is Dr. W. K. Watson, of St. Louis. His name is well known throughout the West, and his reputation has been reached through strictly legitimate means, and so far, that he has secured the enviable reputation which he enjoys. His large measure of success is the result of a thorough and careful preparation for his calling, and extensive reading during a long and useful professional practice, which have enabled him to gain high commendation, even from his professional brethren. Devoting his attention to certain specialties of the science he has so carefully investigated, he has been rewarded in a remarkable degree. In these specialties, he has become a recognized leader. Not a few of the remedies prescribed by him have, it is said, been adopted and prescribed by physicians in other parts of the country. His pamphlets and larger works have been received with great contributions to medical knowledge. He has recently added another, and perhaps more important, to his list of published writings. This book, entitled "The People's Common Sense Medical Adviser," is designed to enter into general circulation. Dr. Watson has received acknowledgments and honors from many sources, and especially scientific degrees from two of the first medical institutions in the land.

The immense demand for his specialties, some time ago necessitated the opening of a regular Dispensary for their preparation, and a small beginning of the business of the establishment has expanded it into mammoth proportions. In order to meet the demand of constantly made up it for the remedies prepared by Dr. Pierce, a large number of men are employed at all times and the expenditures made by Dr. Pierce are enormous. A medical specialty amounting to a thousand dollars a month, while a corps of experienced physicians are constantly employed to the doctor for the benefit of his patients.
