MY SIREN.

All unadorned and unarrayed. On a narrow stone pier. Old House's arena sang and played. No doubt in homely tones. And that classic phrase. Was white with sailors' bones. My siren tells her tuneful tale. In lamp-light drawing rooms. When amid plush and Chippendale. The glossy Broadwood looms. Beyond the lilies and the pale. Count of amiable lions.

My fascinated eyes are bent Upon her as she sings; I turn a dangerous sentiment. Which worships leonine things. Bred of that exquisite content Which only dinner brings. At her white throat the diamonds dart Their many twinkling fire; Which worships leonine things. Bred of that exquisite content Which only dinner brings. Ah, me! we Greeks of later years, In equal peril cast. Where even the staunchest comrade fears That he may yield at last. Fled none to seal with his own ears Or lend us to the mat. —James Gazetta.

A WARTIME STORY.

It was at the Oglethorpe club in Savannah one evening long ago. The quarter of men in the big bay window were three old acquaintances, although meeting that day in the southern city by accident. Pond was on his way to Palatka to join his coast survey party. Georgetown had been down at Key West on a collecting trip for the National Museum and was now on his way back to Washington. Middlebrook, a cousin of Pond's, was en route to the States, and was on his way back to the States, and was on his way back to the States.

The judge was an elderly man, famous as a raconteur, and young in heart himself was fond of younger men and never enjoyed himself so well as on occasions of this kind, but he finally stopped short after a yarn about the occupation of Savannah by Sherman's army in 1864. "Don't ask me for any more, boys. Those were great days, and you may well regret that you were born so late. I would hardly exchange my experience for that of your father and ambition. Let me see. You're the oldest of the three, Mr. Pond, and yet I'll warrant you remember nothing of the war. It is a tall, dark fellow of over 35, well known in scientific circles in Washington, smiled broadly.

"I was thinking, judge," he said, "while you were telling that experience of your wife's at Nashville of an experience another little woman had at the north about the same time, and which, as you suppose, I remember nothing of the war myself. I have a vivid personal interest in this event."

"Let us hear it," said the judge. "It's fair that the old fellow should be given a chance." And calling for cigars and a fresh bottle of Moselle the judge settled back in his easy chair in a comfortable, red faced way, as good a listener as he was a talker.

"The little woman in my mind," said Pond, "was living in Baltimore in 1862. She was only 20, but had been married two years, and a girl baby of nearly a year occupied her time day and night. Six months before her husband had been sent to North Carolina and was acting as naval store-keeper at an important station of the north Atlantic squadron, and was left in a boarding house with a widowed mother."

"It was awfully hard on the poor little thing to live away from her husband, but of course it was no place for her to stay there, so she had to make the best of it on his infrequent letters. She actually used to put the baby up in her high chair and make believe that she was Jim, just back from the south, and she'd tell her how much she loved him and how lonesome she'd been while he was gone, and what a good baby she had been, and she'd give him a kiss to see her, until she was all mixed up in her personal pronouns and broke down and cried over her own poor little game."

"In fact, it only took about seven months to make her desperate. In spite of Jim's description of the desolation of the place, and in fact partly because of it, she made up her mind to join him. Three-quarters of her salary had been coming to her every month from the paymaster general's office in Philadelphia, and she had to go to the office and tell him plainly that she must get transportation to Wilmington, N. C., and that she would die, or something of that sort, if she didn't."

"In a few days a reply came on official paper signed 'J. C. Smith, assistant,' stating that it was practically impossible to comply with her request, but that an opportunity might come by some possibility at some future day and asking further particulars as to her reason, whether her husband was sick and whether she was strong enough to stand such a rough journey."

"The little woman replied in full, and thinking 'J. C. Smith' to be a person of great importance, made as strong an appeal to him as possible. His reply, which came promptly, strengthened her idea of his importance, for he stated that he had been touched by her appeal, and that it was fortunate that her original letter had come to him, for he would be able to do more for her than any one in Philadelphia. 'And there were more questions were asked, and the correspondence was continued, on her part with the single idea that the good Mr. Smith was doing his best to secure her passage to Wilmington, while on his part it was a flirtation with a little grass widow, with perhaps something further in view, for so-called clerks in the office and of bad reputation, as it was afterward found."

"At last a letter came, written, as usual, on official paper, stating that the chance had come, that the coal schooner Sarah Jane would sail for the station from pier 8, Richmond, just outside of Philadelphia, on the following Wednesday, and that the little woman should come to Philadelphia on the train arriving at 8 o'clock Tuesday evening and should go to Kruger's hotel on Blank street, where 'Mr. J. C. Smith' would meet her and see that she was made comfortable and put on the vessel in the best shape imaginable."

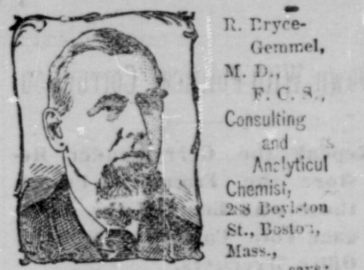

"Then she was happy! She told her aunt Jim, and in spite of the strongest protestations proceeded to pack her trunk. 'She had never traveled, except from the native farm down on the eastern shore to Baltimore, and the old lady insisted that in her inexperience and with a young baby she would meet with all sorts of trouble and would probably not get there alive. Smith had stated in his letter that there was only room in the Sarah Jane for one passenger, and so the aunt could not have gone too."

"In spite of everything, however, the trunk was packed and with the baby's crib and the pet rocking chair was put on board the train late Tuesday afternoon, and the little woman and the baby had a whole seat to themselves and rattled over to Philadelphia in the bumpety bump fashion of the sixties. Holding the baby on one arm, the little mother pulled out Smith's letter and read it over two or three times, and every time she read it her mind misgave her more. The most innocent, unsuspecting person in the world herself, some good angel must have put suspicion into her mind, or if not, at least the idea that it would be safest to go straight to the schooner, for might it not sail without her if she went to the hotel?"

"And so when the train arrived at Philadelphia and the passengers were discharged into the mob of howling backmen her wistful intuition picked out the only honest one in the lot, a young Irishman, and she asked him how much he would charge to take her to pier 8, Richmond. "How much?" he said. "Of course I do it for a cent, but you'll have to take four hours." "Then she told him that she was going to take her husband in the coach, and that she hadn't but $10 with her, and she would need most of it for other things, and so he dropped to 25, for he was just back from the States himself, and he wouldn't rob a seller's wife, and the trunk and crib and rocking chair were piled on the trap, and the mother and baby climbed into the rusty interior and the jolty, gloomy, interminable ride began.

"Richmond and pier 8 were reached at last, and the Irishman and the little woman landed with her baggage, went as directed, out to the end of the pier and across four vessels in all stages of lading until the Sarah Jane was reached. The captain was on shore, and the mate was so taken by surprise that trunk and furniture were deposited on the deck, and the hack man was paid and had gone before he received enough to ask what under the sun she wanted. "Are you the captain of this vessel?" asked the little woman. And when he said she was not and that the captain had gone ashore, but was expected back soon, she calmly said she'd wait, and seated herself in the little rocking chair between trunk and cradle, and rocked to and fro, singing softly to the baby, until after awhile big round shouldered, downy faced little woman had been before her. "How do you do, mom?" he said. "I'm Captain Grimes, and the boys say you want to see me." (This was a New England twang the little woman had never heard before.) "Captain Grimes, weren't you expecting me?" And her heart began to sink. "Waal, no, mom! I can't say I expected you." Then, looking at the trunk, "You don't mean to tell me as you calculate to ship with us?" "Why, I was sent to Baltimore by Mr. Smith of the paymaster general's office, and he wrote me that he had arranged everything, and that I was to sail for Wilmington on the 'Sarah Jane' in the morning." "And nearly ready to cry the poor thing stood there in the lantern light, with her baby lugged tightly to her breast, the picture of distress. "I never set eyes on your Mr. Smith, and I never heard tell of him, and there ain't no possibility for you to go on any such craft as this here," said the old fellow. "So you'd just better come ashore with me, mom, and one of the boys'll fetch your things, and I'll take you to a respectable tavern."

"The little woman nearly broke down, but with tears in her eyes and great sobs in her voice she told the captain her story and begged him to take her. And when he said that he had no room, no place in which he could put her, and nothing to give her to eat, she declared that she could sleep on deck, and that if they had hardtack and water that would be enough for her, and seeing denial still on his grim old face she choked down her sobs and sat resolutely down in the chair and waited. They must take her, and that was the end of it. The captain still expostulated, but she said with a lofty air that the letter from the paymaster general of the States, which she had in her pocket, was authority enough for him, and that he'd be paid for the passage if that was what he wanted, and that (with great emphasis) she was going to stay!
