ELLEN'S DIARY

There Is No Night Where Dwell The Blessed Dead

More than once during the recent months, these lines have come to mind as we chatted with James of some passing in this community or farther, of folks we had known:

"When I remember all the friends so linked together,
I've seen around me fall, like leaves in wintry weather.
I feel like one who treads alone some banquet-hall deserted,
Whose lights are fled, whose garlands dead,
And all but he departed..."

This seems to have been a sad year, as indeed was the last" one in another Province wrote in a letter of this morning. "We miss so many now—the old neighbours and friends we knew, who were taken from us... removed by death. It is perhaps only a natural course of events but to me, it appears to have been more marked in the recent months.

This afternoon with James, we attended the funeral of him who was (maternal) Grandfather to Jamie and Gage. Naturally, the two experienced a deep sense of personal loss at his passing, for he was one who ever kept the welfare of his children, and children's children at heart. He was of that Brotherhood we speak of as "Railroad men." His active, adult years were those which observed the morning call, and the sounds of the trains. Even across distances, just as surely as James hearing, can keep his finger on the pulse of the farming, so this man recognized the affairs of his calling.

We have noticed this and smiled, when he would note the echo of a train's whistle, drifting across the coutryside to Rob's where he visited. "That's old..." he would smile, mentioning the "name" of the locomotive. "Yes" he would say. And name those who would make up the crew on that run.

He was a kind man, well loved and respected in his home, which we think, is the mark of a good man... Too often, it would seem, we put on our best smiles for others neglecting to give our sweetest to those of our own, near and dear.

Industrious, faithful to his every task, God- respecting, God- loving, he has left a fine example to his younger generations of his line, who now mourn so sadly his passing.

We remember now— what nice memories, lovely incidents of living return, of one gone — that a self- appointed service of his summery Sundays from the first flowerings of his garden until last blossoms had been gathered, was to place flowers on the graves of those of his family and line, lovely "loved and lost a while", including the mother of the pair of this name, who today mourn his loss.

"We must now bring the flowers."

And over there—past Jordan?, "The city lieth foursquare, and the gates of it shall not be shut by day: for there shall be no night there."

"No shadows There! No evening time creepeth;
No midnight dark its mantle deep doth spread;
No silver star through the darkness peepeth;
There is NO NIGHT where dwell the blessed dead.

There is no night of things unknown, uncertain.
Things which now try the heart to make it strong;
There is no dark,—there is the veiling curtain—
Just light; and bliss; and joy; and endless song!"

Until tomorrow— Diary — Good-night.....

MARY HAWORTH

Wife Advised Tell Husband She Knows Of Entanglement

Dear Mary Haworth: My husband and I have been married 12 years. We have two lovely children, ages 10 and 8. I feel we love each other but a problem has arisen that I don't know how to meet. We live in a small community where I can't discuss it with anyone.

Briefly it is this: for several years, straws in the wind have suggested that my husband is interested in some other woman. Various times I've confronted him with the idea but he denied it flatly, which left me tearful, forgiving and uncertain.

Recently, however, I found a note— in his pocket, where I shouldn't have been looking. I know— from a girl, asking him for more money for her doctor bill. She had terminated her pregnancy and was all right now, the letter said.

Now what do I do? I haven't mentioned the letter to him nor acted as if I know anything. He is very worried and perturbed, not sure what happened to the note. Should I take it up with him, or keep quiet?

Since reading the note I feel nothing for him, though I think I still love him. I don't want a divorce but I feel he should be held accountable for his miscondu ct. I am a very easy going person but I don't want him to feel he can get away with this kind of thing whenever he likes.

Why am I emotionally numb? I hope I don't crack up suddenly, as I am afraid I may. Please advise me immediately. —G.L.

Dear G.L.: Your emotional numbness since finding the evidence of his disloyalty is probably due partly to shock and partly to profound subconscious conflict between rage and dependency feelings in relation to your husband.

No doubt you've hesitated to confront him with the note because you fear that in a showdown you might lose him. You are afraid that if he is given the opening to discuss his infidelity or is called upon to account for it, he just might ask for a divorce and marry his inamorata.

As for what to do, I think your best chance of salvaging a "redeemed" companions hip from the present emotional shambles is by letting him know that you have the note and that you are heartbroken by its implications.

He has been living a lie in concealing his involvement with the girl. And you would be making a bad matter worse, morally and psychologically, if you were to carry the deception further by trying to live a responsive lie in relation to him, pretending you don't know about the sordid entanglement.

It seems preferable to be guided by constructive principle, rather than by feelings of fear, hurt or anger in this crisis. Therefore, I say let in light and truth on the situation. If this forthright approach to reality leads to an open break, it will mean that the marriage was already a shell. If it survives a candidly fierce or anguished stocktaking, it may develop into a stronger, healthier, more mature and more steadfast companionship as a result of disaster lived through.

So, brace yourself for a painful sense and hand him the note. Ask him what it means to your marriage and also what he feels your attitude should be, since you've been too numb since reading the note to know what to think or do.

He will likely try to defend himself by blaming you for snooping through his pockets

Higher Sugar Prices Predicted To Continue For Some Time

OTTAWA (CP) — Latest indications point to a drop of at least one-third in the Cuban sugar crop this year from that of last year, an informed source said here.

The harvest is expected to range between 4,000,000 and 4,200,000 tons compared with an estimated 6,600,000 to 6,800,000 tons harvested last year.

The short crop is held largely responsible for a big increase in the world price of sugar and a consequent jump in retail prices.

The Canadian housewife began to really feel the pinch last November, when the average retail price spurted to 10.3 cents from 9.7 a month earlier.

Since then the cost has continued steadily upward, until Monday it was 13 to 14 cents a pound in Ottawa.

Trade experts predict that sugar prices will remain at an abnormally high level for some time to come.

Compounding the effect of the expected fall in the Cuban harvest are rising demand from some of the underdeveloped countries and crop damage both in the southern United States and in sugar-producing countries of Europe.

SEE BIG SLUMP

If the predictions on this year's Cuban crop, now being harvested, prove well founded the crop will have slumped by about 3,000,000 tons from that of two years ago, when it surpassed 7,000,000 tons.

The drop is attributed to a combination of poor crop conditions and damage believed done to cane stands by inexperienced cutters during the 1961 and 1962 harvests.

These inexperienced cutters, recruited in the cities, were pressed into service to supplement the work of Cuba's peasants. Reports have suggested that many peasants have lost their incentive to work in the cane fields under conditions of socialism.

Cuba is believed to have committed 4,680,000 tons of sugar to the Soviet bloc this year under various barter arrangements—somewhat more than she is now expected to produce.

However, the Soviet bloc is said to have agreed to forego at least temporarily some 2,000,000 tons of the commitment in order to allow Cuba to meet other commitments to countries such as Japan, Communist China and Egypt.
