MY LADY MELODY

By ARTHUR HARDY
Author of "The Merry Masquerade", "Love Song", etc., etc.

THE GREAT CEZANNE.

Sheila was glad Howard had not accepted Garner Owen's invitation, for she would have been obliged to be with him all the evening and Howard could be deadly dull at a gathering of musicians, as Sheila well knew. In such society he simply would not talk, and in consequence nobody talked to him.

The Thursday dinner at Garner Owen's provided the usual pleasant experience.

Cezanne was there, and Garner Owen had placed him opposite to Sheila at table, Mario sat on her right.

Among the other distinguished guests was Sir Barton Cove, famous musician, conductor and composer, whose name was identified for many years with the Promenade Concerts and who had of late taken charge of the Philharmonic Orchestra.

After dinner the guests invaded the music salon, where Garner Owen drew the two of them aside and introduced Sheila, to the great conductor.

"Sir Barton has a proposal to make," he said. "He was present at your Recital."

Sir Barton bowed. A fine big man with broad shoulders and a heavy body, with the kindest eyes Sheila had ever seen.

"I was greatly impressed, Miss Huntley," he said, "and here and now I would like to ask to play as leader in my orchestra for three performances I have to give before I go to Berlin in a month's time. It should provide you with first-class experience of a new kind, and after that you will be able to make your bow at the Albert Hall or Queen's or anywhere else you may choose for your great public re-entry with all the confidence in the world."

Sheila was delighted at the prospect. She would be starred as leader, of course.

"The... will be only three performances," Sir Barton told her.

Sheila glanced at Garner Owen who nodded.

"Accept the offer," he said.

"Very well," said Sheila.

Sir Barton bowed.

"Thank you I am honoured. Now, sit down with me and your host and let us listen to Cezanne."

For Cezanne was going to play to-night.

Sheila felt greatly excited, for she had never heard Cezanne play in the flesh, although she had several of his gramophone records at home.

He came from behind the arch of the anteroom, violin tucked under his arm, bow in hand.

The very pose of Cezanne was impressive, compelling. He seemed to command attention as his right arm and from the very first note he played he held the spectators spell-bound.

Sheila had never heard such depth and beauty of tone from a violin. It was a Bergonzi, a rare and remarkable instrument, whose fame was world-wide. The violin was not by one of the greatest of the Italian makers, but possessed tone and quality unknown by any other fiddle turned out by this second-rate yet distinguished maker. Cezanne, Sheila knew, always preferred it to his Stradivarius.

Cezanne's playing was touched by a rare beauty and his style was simple and unexaggerated. He created effects here and there by dwelling on a note or making a pause and in the rapid passages he carried everything by storm.

His final note compelled applause. At times whilst he was playing Sheila closed her eyes so that she could not see the man. Divorced from his magnetic personality, his playing was still fine, but Sheila, thought, as she studied it, that she could manage similarly to that, indeed, she would prefer to cut out some of the tricks of over-emphasis.

When all was over and Cezanne held court to a crowd of women admirers, Forsetti came to Sheila.

"Well, what do you think?" he asked.

"He is wonderful, Forsetti."

"H'm, yes Cezanne can play," The pianist eyed her shrewdly. "But there is nothing he can do that you cannot, Miss Huntley. He has one big advantage; that Bergonzi. Now, that is a devil of a violin. Wherever did he find it, and how did Bergonzi ever come to make it? I have never heard another by that maker that could come within a mile of it. It is a better instrument by far than your own. Change violins with Cezanne, adopt all his tricks, and you would be his equal—and personally I should prefer to cut out the tricks."

Sheila's eyes were shining.

"Me play as finely as Cezanne! That is nonsense, Forsetti!"

"I assure you," he persisted, "it is not. You have a first-class violin, Bergonzi, but it is not like that Bergonzi. It has not the same brilliance or depth of tone. If I could choose a violin for you out of all the best in the world I would make of you a better soloist than Cezanne."

Later, when at last Cezanne was able to detach himself from the press of feminine admirers, he came to Sheila. She told him how much his playing had delighted her.

"I have rarely played so well," he confessed, taking the chair next to hers, and leaning towards her. "But then I looked down and met your bright eyes, and they inspired me."

"What a remarkable violin you have," she said, looking away from him.

"The Bergonzi! It is a freak. It was made in 1760 towards the end of the life of that maker. I came upon it in a shop in Berlin. I had to play a lot of money for it, but I have no regrets. Indeed, I don't think I should be so great without it. My Strad has been often repaired and is tired."

He fetched his violin case and took out of it the instrument which he placed in her hands. It was certainly a lovely violin with a richness of varnish that was rare. She measured its length and fingered it without striking a sound. It fitted her perfectly. She

Artificial Brooding of Chicks

In the artificial brooding of chicks, there are a number of systems in successful use, such as the hot water pipe system, the force draft hot air systems, the battery system and the colony house pan. Of these, under general Canadian conditions the comparatively small grower, the miter system has proven most satisfactory. For a source of heat, the coal-burning brooder stove is by long odds the most popular, although for brooding in the late spring and summer, oil or electricity has many advantages.

No thermometer is as good an indicator as the chicks themselves. Their actions will tell at once whether they are comfortable or not. When the chicks rest contentedly in a circle just outside the canopy of the stove, you may know that the temperature is right. If they are not warm enough they will quickly tell you by their discontented chirping and their crowding to the source of heat. If too hot they will get as far from the stove as possible or go around with their beaks open panting for breath.

When the chicks are first put in the brooder, use a fine mesh guard to circle the hover a couple of feet from the edge. When they become used to the source of heat, the circle is enlarged and finally removed giving them the run of the entire house. Ventilate freely but avoid draughts.
