le Tim," for Miss Peck, Timothy sitting at his desk in the study where he had gone with a conscious directed effort of his intelligence but where he could not work, suddenly had a clear sight around in the morning." He had till then gone through the day very creditably, reading had found at the breakfast table with it, "We felt you were just too busy to bother about anything but this big fight on your hands." Aunt Lavinia, not very much interested by one wedding more or less in the world, had to say about the good sense the young people had shown in getting the thing over with—at a minimum of expense and bother. Like a man in the dentist's chair sitting through the killing and extraction of a nerve, Timothy had sat grimly through his daily hour with Delia—an hour filled not with history and mathematics, but with a wild outburst of horrified bewilderment from the girl.

Timothy had gone to bed at once after the mass meeting, but not to sleep. He leaned from the window, measuring with his eye the distance to the great stone doorstep two stories below. Someone was sitting there. A man with his elbows on his knees in the attitude of waiting. As Timothy strained his eyes through the starlit darkness, incredulous of what he seemed to see, the hammer-stroke of total astonishment driving out for the instant everything else from his head, looked up, saw Timothy at the window and got quickly to his feet. It was not a man. It was a tall boy. It was Eli Kemp. Eli was motioning, was calling in a low voice. "Can I come up, Professor Hulme? It's Eli. Are you awake? Can I come up a minute?" Without waiting for an answer, he pushed open the never locked front door and came into the house. "I got an idea, Professor Hulme! I couldn't wait to talk it over with you, so I got dressed and came to sit on the front step and wait till I heard somebody stirring around in the morning." Timothy got back into bed and pulled up the sheet. "Take a chair, Eli, and let's hear," he said. But Eli could not sit still. Pacing fast up and down the room, he began to talk. After ten minutes Timothy said, not sceptically at all, "Hold on! Let's go into my study and get out some road maps and the Vermont register. And some Windward county town reports. By the Lord Almighty, Eli, I believe you've got something!" It was black night when they went into the study. The first signal from the outer world that reached them was, astonishingly, the breakfast smell of coffee.

Timothy took up a typewritten page and said, "Let's see how it sounds, now we've got it all put together." He read: "Before automobiles were in general use Vermont towns were literally isolated, except in those places where one of our railroads ran two or three trains a day. Every community was shut up to its own resources and its own people from November to May. Within the last few years these conditions have been transformed.

"One such way to make use of the new conditions has occurred to Mr. Eli Kemp of Clifford, a recent graduate of the Academy. During his senior year at the Academy, he organized, together with Mr. William Peck, and ran an Academy bus service used by the athletic teams for their out of town games. He now proposes, giving his full time, to employ their two buses (capacity thirty passengers each) for the daily transportation of students from the smaller hill towns. Heretofore, only such students from those towns have been able to attend the Academy as were able to pay board in Clifford. Mr. Kemp and Mr. Hulme of the Academy, after careful calculation figure that if this plan is carried out, from sixty-five to seventy new students can be daily brought to the Academy. This would increase the student body to about two hundred." He laid down the paper. "Eli, do you realize that that number of new students will bring in clear more than four thousand dollars for the Academy every year, and give you fair pay for your time?" To be continued
