ELLEN'S DIARY

Blooms In Island Gardens Are Rich And Abundant

"We're a favored people — that's what we Islanders are" an oldish farmer- visitor at Allerlea today offered. "Warnings have been up for that hurricane that is moving up from the South. It would strike here, with rain and wind—oh, perhaps not too strongly, but enough to feel its force" he nodded.

"And" he smiled, "fortunately, all we've had is some rain-fall."

"And we've been complaining about that" we chuckled.

"Yes... been complaining" he said soberly. "Now" he queried "have you ever experienced a gale'?"

"Odd ones" we replied

He looked off over the fields: the grainlands commencing now to be tinged with the harvest-shade, the pastures still lush, the groves and woodlands so green and beautiful.

"What harm it would have done on farms at this time of year! It's fearful just to think of it. Farmers don't want any big blow of storm before this harvest. Why, fields would soon be levelled" he said.

"There's promise of a good harvest, isn't there?"

He shook his head. "Too good... too good. Some stands of grain are already breaking down. But there" he grinned "we complain when our crops are poor. We oughtn't to, when they're abundant! What's down, well, I've seen many a harvest in my time, and I've never seen much of it go to waste. It will be gathered."

"Folks will be glad when it's all gathered in" we said.

"They will" he agreed. "But then" he smiled "no one would've away these days that lend a to the harvest-home. now would they?"

"No. Time is precious to all."

"And sweet" he nodded.

"And sweet" we said.

"Sweet these days are, and full with our "farings." Each brings its own features, none identical with those of yesterday, but all interestingly different, and new... Now we may roam. And roaming find many loveliness.

Again, we home-come back to old lane, a familiar street, and "our own" the things we enjoy doing; the folks we esteem "come back to us" and we find life is good.

Now Island-gardens indeed blossom. Beautiful the flowerings are. Rich the colors that bedeck them. It seems as though every last seed sown in spring has faithfully brought forth its flower... What beauty a few seeds can effect! A packet bought. Or the home - grown, gathered at a forward thought through the summery days; always gathering enough to share to give added loveliness to another's life and living, enriching them beyond measure, as we have so often seen such sharing do.
