

Dorothy Dix's Column—

You began to straighten out that complication by agreeing to consider your husband's church. But how far did your concession go? After a few conferences you decided it was too much trouble to understand his religion, and down you went in defeat again. Your difficulties with your mother-in-law follow the same pattern. You made no allowances for her shock at having her son secretly wed. I'm quite sure she was no happier in having a strange and unexpected daughter-in-law foisted upon her than you were to share her living quarters. Obvious to the fact that it WAS her home, you expected things to be arranged according to your own convenience. Your husband was undoubtedly so fed up with the constant bickering around him that he welcomed the call to service. Perhaps he's beginning to regret his hasty marriage, and you are largely to blame if he is. Now you are realizing that you two should "talk things over!" The time for that was eight months ago, but even now it's not too late if you are willing to face the complications of your marriage. Write your husband and, instead of complaining, let him know that you realize your responsibilities and will henceforth meet them squarely.

DEAR MISS DIX: I'm 19 and going with a boy in service. He writes me every day and tells me he loves me. I've never told him I love him, because I know I don't. I like going out on dates with him, but have no intentions of becoming serious over him. I don't want to encourage or discourage the boy. How can I tell him how I feel?

ANSWER: In view of his regard for you, it's scarcely fair to keep him dangling. Tell him frankly that you like him very much, enjoy the dates you have and would like to continue the status quo. He can then decide whether to go on dating you in hope that he will win your love, or give up the quest.

DEAR MISS DIX: Through my high-school years I had many dates and good times. Now I have been out of school for two years, and rarely have a date. I have become interested in a boy quite a bit older, whom I have never met formally. We see each other on the street and I know he used to date my best friend. How can I get to know him? I do not know his church preference or any activities in which he is interested.

ANSWER: Surely your best friend could give information on the boy's activities. If you don't want to ask her outright, hinting around should elicit the desired information. Once you know where he is
