Secret Service Reveals New 'Peril' At White House

By ART EDSON
WASHINGTON (AP) — A veteran secret service man recently started talking about the perils of guarding the presidential family. "One new duty, he said, is to fill in when an additional player is needed to round out a Kennedy touch-football game. He wasn't sure he liked the new assignment, and for a rather unusual reason. "I hate to hit a woman," the secret service man said. "But that Ethel Kennedy will kill you."

This story about Ethel—mother of seven and wife of Attorney-General Robert F. Kennedy—epitomizes what has happened in White House circles since the J. F. Kennedy's moved in a year ago next Saturday.

Under Eisenhower, it often seemed to be government by committee.

Under President Kennedy, it often seems to be government by relatives, of which there is an abundant supply, all in constant motion.

SET TONE
These relatives — plus members of the official family — have established the social and extracurricular tone of this administration.

A year ago it was thought that Kennedy, young and vigorous, would set a tremendous physical pace in the White House.

It's true he has kept on the move, but since he hurt his back while planting a ceremonial tree in Ottawa last May—the most indelible image of the president is his comfortable pose in a rocking chair.

But there has been nothing sedentary about the rest of the family. And this includes Mr. and Mrs. Joseph P. Kennedy, the president's parents.

Before his stroke Dec. 19, they flitted about the country, and between the U.S. and Europe, sometimes alone, sometimes with each other, like international commuters.

HEADS PEACE CORPS
Brother-in-law Sargent Shriver heads the Peace Corps, brother-in-law Stephen Smita is in the state department, and brother Edward is making noises that sound exactly like the noises a young man makes when he hopes to be senator from Massachusetts.

But of all the Kennedys, none has been a greater surprise than the president's wife, Jacqueline.

During the campaign political observers questioned whether Mrs. Kennedy was much of an asset. She looked so young, so fragile, so chic that some sceptics privately expressed the belief that it might be providential that she was pregnant and couldn't take an active part. It's true that Mrs. Kennedy hasn't shown intense interest in practical politics. Her interests are—painting, music literature, interior decorating, "historical furnishings, fashion.

POPULAR ABROAD
But on trips abroad Mrs. Kennedy has really shone. In Europe and in South America she attracted almost as much attention as the president. At a Paris luncheon Kennedy introduced himself as "the man who accompanied Jacqueline Kennedy into Paris."

But the real White House star has been Caroline.

Cute, vivacious, self-possessed, as only a four-year-old girl can be, she has been the delight of photographers and the despair of Republicans.

Representative Jessica Weiss (Rep. N.Y.) stated the problem, succinctly and sadly: "The Democrats have one secret weapon we cannot fight," she said. "Little Caroline Kennedy."
