Thoughts For Our Time

By His Eminence Cardinal McGuigan (Copyright)

One of the precious freedoms of the democratic way of life and of which we like to boast, and rightly so since it is essential to that way of life, is the freedom of the press. But, as in the case of every other kind of freedom, it is something whose nature and value must be carefully examined from time to time and clearly understood, in order that its integrity may be preserved, that it may not itself develop into a form of tyranny or deteriorate into mere license.

None of the free institutions developed by free men are ends in themselves. They have been developed and instruments for the promotion and protection of true human liberty. Considered in itself the basic notion of the freedom of the press is but an initial freedom, that is to say, a freedom of indifference that may itself be used either well or ill. If properly used it becomes an ever more perfect instrument for the promotion and protection of the human liberty. If abused, then, either it exercises or attempts to exercise an undue interference in the free activity of man, or it becomes itself an instrument actively promoting the deterioration of true human liberty into license.

Literature And Life

By BOOKMAN
DANTE'S PARADISE.

The idea of an abode for the blessed is familiar to many poets and prose writers. We have to mention two the "Vision of Mirza" by Addison and "In Memoriam," by Tennyson. The former, after being moved by the picture of the Bridge, with its pitfalls and broken arches, is told to look farther afield and sees those happy islands which are, he is told, the abode of the blessed dead. This vision relieves, and he feels that life is not in vain when there is such a future accessible for man. Tennyson pictures his friend as advanced, and wonders if he will find of school days has forgotten—wondering as a ploughman stands in the furrow, and asks if his old friend of school day has forgotten him even if he is still but a ploughman. "Does my old friend remember me?" Have the glories of heaven caused him to forget?

Some of Dante's best poetry is to be found in the "Paradise." The Divine Comedy is a poem of order; there are nine circles in hell; seven terraces in purgatory, and ten heavens, 34 cantos in hell; 33 in purgatory and 33 in paradise—one hundred in all. There is variety, and contentment with their lot. The first heaven is that of the moon, Dante hears his: "And this condition, which appears so low, so low, Is for this cause assigned us, that our vows Were in some part neglected and made void..."
