Heart Throbs And Soul Interest In Great Fox Picture—"Over The Hill"

Where is the mother that has ever given a thought to sacrifices made for her children? Ma Benton saved for hers and has seen them drift away one by one, with the exception of John, the harem-scurum, who cannot marry Isabella Strong because he cannot support her; and Charles, whose desire to become an artist has kept marriage from his mind.

To his brothers and sisters, John is a standing reproach. Particularly does he irritate his oldest brother, Isaac, a pillar of the church. Only his parents and his sweetheart have faith in him.

Knowledge of his own guilt eventually kills Pa Benton. Charles marries and moves to New York. One by one, Ma tries to make her home with her children, only to find that she is in the way. John, released from prison, has gone West. Success comes his way, but because of his former disgrace he allows his mother and the rest of the family, with the exception of Isaac, to think him dead.

"Any maybe, when we had got home, and entered the cottage door, Sae didn't start back kind of sudden—as if he'd seen it before! And maybe it wasn't pleasant—our cosy evening tea—With her quite often stopping, and huggin' and kissin' me!"

"And maybe we didn't live happy, for quite a number of years! And I gained the respect of my neighbors—in spite of my brother's sneers, And spite of my sisters' caution; who said, as I have heard, That they never could own a brother that had been a prison bird!"
