The bidding:

East	South	West	North
Pass	1 ♠	Pass	2 ♠
Pass	4 ♠

Opening lead—nine of hearts.

The declarer is often faced with this problem: If the opponents' cards are divided in a certain way, he should follow one line of play; while if the opponents' cards are divided in a different way, he should follow another line of play.

Such problems are seldom decided by the mental toss of a coin. There are nearly always clues to guide declarer in the right direction. He is not expected to guess right in all these situations, but he should turn in a good batting average over a period of time.

West led a heart and East played the A-K-Q, declarer ruffing the third heart. The question is: How should South proceed from this point?

Suppose he enters dummy with a trump and leads the queen of clubs and finesses. West wins and can return an old shoe and beat the contract. South will have to lose a diamond trick and go down.

But if South, at trick four, plays the ace and another club, the contract cannot be defeated. If West takes the king, declarer, after drawing trumps, can discard his two diamond losers on the Q-J of clubs. And if West does not take the king, declarer can cash the A-K of diamonds and give up a diamond, thus insuring ten tricks, since he can ruff the fourth diamond safely in dummy.

The entire proposition boils down to who declarer thinks has the king of clubs. If East has it, South should finesse, and if West has it, South is better advised to lead the ace and another club.

We grant that declarer has no sure-fire choice, but the indications point strongly to West's having the king. Assuming that the location of the king of clubs is a 50-50 proposition before play starts, these odds change radically as soon as East shows up with the A-K-Q of hearts.

In the great majority of hands where East is dealt the A-K-Q of hearts and king of clubs and nine other cards, he would open the bidding as dealer.

London's Prostitutes Driven Underground

By ANTHONY WHITE

LONDON (AP) — London's darkened streets were strangely silent early Sunday. Gone were the high-heeled tap-tap and whispered endearments of the prostitutes.

The girls had scattered underground, driven from their street beats by a tough new law which makes soliciting in public punishable by heavy fines and a jail term.

With the new law going into effect at midnight Saturday, there was hardly a provocative figure in sight all along the sidewalks of the West End.

As Big Ben chimed midnight, the last street walkers along park lane stepped out of the shadows and disappeared.

Once the girls used to gather in groups along Park Lane and accost men emerging from the plus hotels.

FINES INCREASED

Now if any woman is caught soliciting anywhere in England she is subject to this schedule of penalties:

First offence, £10 ($28) fine; second offence, £25 ($70) fine; third offence, £25 plus a possible jail sentence of three months.

Under the old law the only penalty was a £2 fine.

The prostitutes are indignant. Little knots of them have been seen around public parks the last few days lining up a plan of action against the new Street Offenses Act.

"We do a lot of good," said Yvonne, a Frenchwoman who admitted being over 40. "You see, there will be more sex crimes under this new law."

USE CARS

Police said more of London's 7,500 street girls are soliciting from cars, enabling them to make fast getaways if spotted. Others are expected to use "business cards" displayed in stores windows, euphemistically describing themselves as models or escorts.

Still other are turning to the call girl business, working out of night clubs and hotels or migrating to the provinces and suburbs where their faces aren't so well known to the police.

But the police reported the new law appeared to have achieved its prime objective—to clear the streets of the public parade of prostitutes.

Two hours after midnight, a Scotland Yard inspector said:

"All over London there have been far fewer arrests for soliciting than usual."
