ELLEN'S DIARY

The New Moon Arises In A Frosty Night Sky

"The oak's leaves have fallen" we remarked at breakfast sooting, naturally with some regret, the bare limbs between us and the opposite rise of valley. Now last leaves about us were shed.

"It's come to the time, Ellen" James said, helping himself to a piece of toast the maple coils in the range had flavored. . . The aroma of mingling toast and tea and the morning's porridge are, we always think, among the most fragrant scents of our day. True there are others, each in its own time and season enjoyable. The smell of a roast is welcomed by folks who come in to the noon meal from the cool of the fieldwork or chores, as to us also is that of a wash taken indoors fresh from the line; or the new-baked loaves a - row on a cupboard. Presently, or even now, to turn thoughts towards the carols and all the holiness and tinsel of Christmas, many an old and more modern kitchen will declare the fact of its approach by the aroma of spiciness that obtains about, come from the fruit-cake baking. "Likely some snowflurries today. Frost tonight" we caught the gist of the weather forecast. "That doesn't sound too good, does it?" James queried, pushing back his chair. "We must try to get the rest of those roots (rutabagas) gathered up today."

"Did you see what I saw today?" Peter questioned, calling by after school, young eyes aglow. "The first snow! Not much, was there? Only flurries. But I expect there'll be plenty of it this winter, won't there? Enough to play in - to build snowmen and forts, and. . . he smiled wistfully, lost in intriguing thoughts.

"Plenty" we assured him. And James went this morning to Rob's to lend a hand at their fieldwork, the farmer from the house across the lane to his carpentry, and Mack to a number of commissions. "Now that we're fitting up things for the winter, don't you think we should replace that wide door at the back of the straw-barn with a narrower one?" we overheard the younger farmer propose recently. "There is no need for it now. We can have an opening above it to the lofts, to let in the bales." What thoughts came to us from the past! How necessary once upon a time in our farming that wide rolling door has been. Many a load of hay, or sheaves had been drawn up the short ramp there, behind some dependable horse, or team, in a furrow, through the doorway to the pleasant shadows within. The threshold, that hired, as well as others the firm later acquired, was set down just inside it, the old-time, and really magic engine without. When called to "empty baskets" to the granary, the wide open door allowed one, in any spells of waiting for them to fill, delightful glimpses of vistas without; the morning sun on the fields, the afternoon shadows lengthening prettily, the rolling hillside planted to potatoes, or otherwise cropped or pastured running up, summery - clad, to touch the blue of the sky. "Yes" James nodded, "it would be just as well." The spell of mildness is over. The mercury falls. Stars sparkle. And high above the old mill in the low of the valley, come to have us wish our wishes upon, is a charming crescent of new moon!
