The Psychiatric

pital are the assessment of the home situation prior to discharge in certain cases, and also the follow-up of patients after discharge. The social adjustment of the patient following his return to the community is of prime importance, but the process of readjustment in the psychiatric patient is often made very difficult because of the negative attitudes in the community towards mental illness. The social worker should be available to visit and help the patient with some of the problems that inevitably arise as the patient struggles to re-establish himself in the community. This kind of help can go a long way towards reducing the rate of readmissions which now occur. In the psychiatric or mental health clinic, the social worker again may be used to obtain from the relatives pertinent information for understanding of the patient, and in some cases she might work directly with the patient if during the course of psychiatric treatment social problems, such as employment, finances, etc., arise. The social worker may help find a solution to these problems through appropriate use of community resources.

In the case of disturbed children who may be referred to the clinic, it is often the parent-child relationship which plays an important part in the cause or continuance of the child's disturbance. For this reason while the psychiatrist or psychologist works with the child, the social worker works with the parent in an attempt to correct or improve some of the attitudes of the parent toward the child. These are some of the more important ways in which a psychiatric social worker may be utilized in either a mental hospital or mental health clinic. In Prince Edward Island at the present time there is one psychiatric social worker, Miss Ethel Trainor, M.S.W., who is employed with the Provincial Division of Mental Health, and who serves patients both at Falconwood Hospital and at the Mental Health Clinic in Charlottetown.
