Astronaut Describes Rush As He Got Set For Re-Entry

HOUSTON (AP) — Astronaut Scott Carpenter reviewed the final harried moments of his May 24 space trip and said he had to rush to prepare for his return to earth.

"I think one reason I got behind at retrofire (the slowdown to return to earth) was because, just at dawn during the third orbit, I discovered the source of the space particles," Carpenter said.

His words came from the "blue book," the final technical report of his flight three times around the earth. It was released to engineers and scientists attending Tuesday's National Aeronautics and Space Administration conference at this base of the U.S. manned space flight program.

Carpenter's oral report of his experiences highlighted the program of seven technical papers.

In the blue book, Carpenter told of an inadvertent blow his hand delivered to the side of the spacecraft and the resulting cloud of luminous particles he saw through the windows.

Since this indicated the mysterious particles — perhaps the ones Astronaut John Glenn called fireflies on his first orbital flight — came from the spacecraft itself, Carpenter was highly interested and proceeded to repeat the experience.

TIME SLIPPED AWAY

"I felt I had time to get that taken care of and still prepare properly for retofire," he wrote, "but time slipped away."

In his rush to get everything done, Carpenter inadvertently left two control systems on—both the semi - automatic and manual — during the time in which the braking rockets were to fire. This led to a needless expenditure of position control fuel.

John A. O'Keefe, NASA space theoretician said the snowflake-like particles apparently came from the condensation of steam emitted from the spacecraft's cooler system or from small particles of dust, insulation or other sweepings from the spacecraft, or from all these sources.

Opening lead—five of spades.

I have done some bridge teaching in my day, and still do, but what always baffles me is why players have so much trouble counting up to 13.

Everyone knows each player is dealt 13 cards and each suit has 13 cards, but the way I see it, too many players refuse to take advantage of this fact. If they would make more use of this number 13, they would find that the play of the cards is not really as difficult as it's cracked up to be.

Here is an exercise with the number 13. East wins the spade lead and continues with a spade, South ruffing with the ace. Declarer plays the king of diamonds, East showing out.

It is only trick three, but South already knows a great deal about the adverse hands. He knows for a certainty that West started with one spade and four diamonds. He knows West has at least five hearts headed by the ace (and probably the jack) because West would not double five diamonds without the ace and would not bid hearts with less than five of them.

At least ten of West's cards are therefore known to be lodged in three suits, which is another way of saying that West has, at most, three clubs.

Now all that South has to do is assemble this information and then work out a way to take advantage of it. He realizes that if he draws trumps and plays a low heart to the queen, he will probably lose two heart tricks and go down.

To prevent this from happening, he starts by cashing the A-K of clubs. He then plays a trump to the ten and ruffs a club. This clears West of clubs.

Now South draws two rounds of trumps to bring everyone down to four cards. He then plays the king of hearts. West, with only hearts left, must win the ace and return a heart to let South score the ten. If he doesn't take the king, he makes South's task even easier.
