ELLEN'S DIARY

Canned Fruit, To Enjoy Through Winter Season

"And what are you busy doing yourself at?" we asked Alex. He came to press his face against our screen-door with some curiosity this morning. "Playing in the sandpile" he replied with a good gift of words for a two-past lad. "What you do?"

"Going to can fruit."

"Oh? Mommie too? I'll come in" she smiled with nice anticipation. Plums we canned, the large "white" and the more economical smaller dark ones, and bathed in a quick operation to make tasteful eating through the less fruitful seasons. Peaches too we preserved the same way, dipping the fruit in a pan of boiling water a long minute before blanching, to have the skins peel then like magic and so hasten the work to a close.

"Bless the hardwood!" we chuckled to Jeanie, when last night presently sang in their bath. "A good fire—these lies the secret of our quick canning."

And then, since this was the day of the Crapaud Fair to which James had already gone, the afternoon gave over the entire place to our keeping. Solitude in a mixed blessing was ours. How alone we were! The swallows, once our dependable company had flown, gave away stealthily on our account who never like to continue summery trails. The hearthfire's low, the rooster's crow, the pup's bark at once assumed those forlorn tones one may notice about a farmstead when the family is away.

What should we do with our time? The blossoms in the border beckoned us to come and meet new faces, bees our comrades there and the winsome goldfinches on wing. Orange dahlias! How Granddaughter would prize those for the bouquets it pleases her to gather. The horses and younglings of cattle lazed in afternoon content against a far hillside. So pretty was the scene of the stream where we glimpsed it in the green of a meadow or where alders parted at the stream-side. A pleasant breeze, sun-filled stirred the leaves of the lawn trees.

"To be company of sorts, a pair fished down near the mill in the valley. Husband and wife peeped at each other well-nigh need for words. Or maybe they were sweethearts—alone in the quiet world about."

And then we came indoors to write a letter overdue to an old friend. Just a few words to convey so much, because as some one reminds us "There are many people who practically never write to old friends because they have a feeling that if they write they must write at length. But that is a great mistake; and by this—indolent reticence many good ties are broken. The point is the letter, not the length or the literary quality of the letter. And it is pitiful to think that a few words scribbled on a scrap of paper three or four times in a year might save a good friendship perishing listlessly from lack of nutriment."

"And how do you pass your time, Ellen?" James, no Blue-beard-of-a-man queries hanging up his hat, in now at day's close from the stables "while I was away at the Fair?"

Until tomorrow—Diary—Good-night.
