Peace Corps And TV Come To Slave Port

By DENNIS NEELD

BADAGRY, Nigeria (AP) — Television and the U.S. Peace Corps have come to this ancient West African port that once echoed to the cries of thousands of slaves.

Badagry today is a sleepy market town of some 5,000. Two hundred years ago it was a thriving centre of the slave trade. Four times as many persons lived here. Seamen from half a dozen nations thronged its bustling waterfront.

But the port of Badagry declined and fell into disuse with the suppression of the slave trade. Today no ships lie at anchor beyond the treacherous surf that crashes on Badagry beach.

Wooden jetties across the lagoon have since rotted away. Fishermen and their families have moved into Badagry's grim barracoons—airless prisons that held up to 1,000 slaves. Others have crumbled into ruins.

In the swamps behind the town tracks taken by the slave caravans can still be followed.

Most slaves were captured during savage inter-tribal wars. Powerful African warlords brought them to the coast for sale to Dutch, Portuguese, Danish and British traders.

For every 300 slaves who survived a year in the U.S. and the West Indies, it is estimated that 700 perished. About 300 died at the time of the raid or on the journey to the sea, 125 during the voyage, and 75 on landing.

Weighed down by heavy chains around their necks, arms, waists and feet, men, women and children were herded into Badagry's slave market.

A garish Voodoo temple looks out on the dusty clearing that was the old market site. Huge clock faces and weird animal figures are painted on the temple walls. Local guides say pagan worshipers still assemble here for services conducted by Voodoo priests.

In the market, naked slaves were minutely examined for physical defects. Then they were sold or bartered for gin, tobacco, rolls of cloth. In 1786 a slave bought a three-fold profit on being sold in the West Indies.

HAD CHILDRENS' SIZE

Near the old slave market, in a local chief's compound, an woman has a box full of slave chains. The iron neck shackles were jointed to open, ending in loops through which a heavy chain was passed. There were also handcuffs, some for small children, through which a bar was fixed.

On the waterfront, one of the old Portuguese barracoons is still crowded. A dozen or more families live in the dank, dark cells. Holes have been punched in the walls for ventilation. Heavy wooden doors lead on to a courtyard surrounded by open sheds, some with rings in the walls, to which slaves could be tethered.

Television aerials sprout today above the huts and houses of Badagry. Africans whose grandfathers were a slaver's prey tune in now to Bat Masterson and Perry Mason.

But the old bad days are not forgotten. On a dark night on Badagry beach it is said you still can hear the cries of slaves above the pounding surf.

Agreement On Project Expected

By JAMES NELSON

OTTAWA (CP) — Confidence that full agreement will be reached by autumn on all aspects of the long-delayed Columbia River power development was expressed Wednesday by External Affairs Minister Martin.

He said negotiations will resume in two weeks on amendments to the Columbia treaty with the United States. When these are concluded dickering will start on the price to be paid by Americans for Canada's share of the power to be generated downstream in the U.S.

Mr. Martin spoke of having these two matters disposed of and the treaty and agreements submitted to Parliament this fall.

Mr. Martin was interviewed by reporters before and after a cabinet meeting. He returned early Wednesday from the west coast where he inspected the Columbia River from its headwaters to Portland, Ore., where he held discussions with public power authorities.

TO RESUME TALKS

Formal negotiations on the protocol which will be attached to the original treaty began in Ottawa last week. They will be resumed in Ottawa, Washington, or possibly on the Pacific coast.

"I have made clear that as far as the federal government is concerned there will be no delay on our part," Mr. Martin said.

He said that a reasonable price for the downstream benefits is a matter for negotiation and did not mention a figure.
