ELLEN'S DIARY

By An Island Farmer's Wife

In this neighborhood, this was the evening the lads from this and the farms about repaired to remembered haunts along the mill-stream. They came blithely, on quick steps, alder rod or better—if such there be!—at shoulder, shiny tin of bait in hand; and to complete the engaging picture, a dog-friend at heel.

At a window, we saw them come, garbed stoutly against the biting wind of April and we doubt not warmed at heart by the anticipation of the exciting pastime ahead. Beneath damp, lowering skies, down where the stream coursed darkly between its drab banks, they came to try their luck at the fish.

And we wished a wish, or was it not a prayer we offered on their behalf? "Keep them thus," it ran, "clean and boyish and delivered from evil, no matter how far their steps may one day lead—beyond the horizon to strange scenes it may be, but keep minus and hearts as pure and good as they are now in these enchanting days of their youth."

It was Jamie's second spell at the fishing—this first day of the open season for trout. Last night his fishing rod was left in readiness, angle-worms gathered and earthed in a tin, their churning past and jessons, he was away to bed early, a question of moment on his lips: "I wonder if I'll waken in time to go down for a while before school-time?" as sleep bore him off to the Land of laddies' dreams.

Cloudy skies and mist of rain on the windows greeted dourly his rising. We heard a hushed, "The stream's red!" from the younger fellow, who having viewed the then rather desolate landscape was content to return to bed. But not Jamie! There was a sound of steps descending the stairway...

How Can I

By Anne Ashley

Q. How can I loosen drawers that stick? A. Rub a little paste floor wax on the slides and also on the lower edges of the drawers themselves, and polish thoroughly. Unless vigorously rubbed, wax forms a sticky coating, but properly polished it forms a hard, smooth finish.

Q. How can I keep fish hooks from rusting when they are not in use? A. Stick them into corks. This prevents their rusting and keeps them sharp. The hooks also cannot do any damage with their treacherous prongs while thus protected.

Exit Tony Blount

by Sydney Parkman CHAPTER X Continued

It completely upset the only plan that had seemed feasible, and as he lay listening dazedly to the captain's voice, he had sought feverishly in his mind for some other method of extricating himself from a situation which threatened the ruin of all that he had striven and suffered for.

Incidentally, he had learned for the first time that he was assumed to be a survivor—and probably the sole survivor—of a three weeks' old sea catastrophe in which the vessel whose name had been painted on the whaleboat had been lost in unknown circumstances; and in a desperate effort to gain time and fend off his visitor's awkward inquiries as to the details of the disaster, he had pleaded inability to remember anything about it.

The captain's final announcement that they were even then heading for Arafu came as a crowning complication; and when

DOROTHY DIX'S COLUMN

A Page From Past

Teen-Age Children Should Be Advised Of Their Parent's Civil Marriage

DEAR MISS DIX: I'm a mother of 39, the proud parent of two teen-age children. Our home life has been very happy. My husband is a fine and loving man, the children are splendid and we have no domestic problems. Our difficulty goes back to our marriage. We married young, against the wishes of our parents, whose only objection was on the ground of our youth, and the ceremony was performed by a Justice of the Peace. My mother, who is very religious, was heartbroken, but we later had the marriage blessed in church with everything straightened out satisfactorily. Now, the children are at an age where they ask questions about our courtship and wedding. They want to know why we didn't have a big church wedding, why I have no bridal dress, etc.

TRoubled Parents FRANKNESS ADVISED ANSWER: Trying to keep the circumstances of a marriage a secret from children is foolish and futile. The minute they sense a mystery about something, they'll uncover it by hook or by crook. Frankness is the best policy. Tell them you were secretly married, and why. Admit that it was a grave mistake, that you've regretted it ever since, and hope that they profit from your error. Let them know how sorry you are that there are no pictures of you as a glamorous bride, no wedding veil to pass on to your daughter, and no sweet memories of a flower-filled church as a background to your nuptials. The children will be as sorry as you are that you missed all these things, and your frankness may go a long way in convincing them that they won't miss the things you failed to have. Teen-agers appreciate the confidence of their parents and it's too bad that so many mothers and fathers fail to realize this.

DEAR MISS DIX: My problem is most unusual, and I'd appreciate your advice. I am 19 and engaged to a boy 18; we plan to be married in May or June. I have just learned that I need a thyroid operation. I would hate to go into marriage and have my husband immediately faced with such a big expense. My mother and father can't afford to finance the operation, either. I'd get a job and pay for myself, but Daddy doesn't want me to go to work, even though I've finished high school. Should I tell my fiancé before we're married, or wait?

ANSWER: Your brief note is so full of problems, I don't know which to tackle first. Perhaps I'll just skip lightly over the obvious folly of marrying an 18-year-old boy, and get down to the presented facts of your illness. It doesn't seem reasonable that you could be confronted with so serious an operation without your parents' knowledge. This is the problem to be solved at once. Your mother and father should be told of your illness, and in fact, they should talk to your doctor about it. You say your dad can't afford to pay for an operation, yet he is able to keep a 19-year-old girl in idleness. Unless there's serious need for your presence at home, you should take a job. Be frank with your parents, and equally frank with your doctor and your fiancé. Brooding, as you do, will only add to your physical difficulties.

DEAR MISS DIX: After going with me for several months, the boy I like in school suddenly dropped me. Although he is pleasant when we meet in school, he hasn't asked for another date? Should I drop him or try to win him back?

ANSWER: Since you seem to be the one who was dropped, your first question is purely academic. Trying to win him back won't work, either, since he would certainly ask you out if he were the one to drop you. Morning over one boy is a sure way to scare other males away. So forget this youth, and be nice to the other lads at school.

he found himself alone again he lay back and endeavored to think the situation out calmly. It was an extraordinary predicament in which to find himself. It seemed that his rescuers were so firmly convinced that he was the newly-appointed Resident of Arafu, that they were going out of their way to land him on the island in order that he should take up his official duties without delay!

On the face of it, this was utterly fantastic—but what was he to do about it? If he disclaimed the identity they had thrust upon him, how interested would they have been found admiring the ill-labeled Mauwau's whale-boat? There were only two alternatives. He could tell the truth; or he could try and concoct some story of having been aboard the vessel at the time of the disaster.

The first was unthinkable. He would die sooner than be sent back to that hell on earth—particularly after having gone through so much suffering in his efforts to escape. And the second was obviously impossible. How could he claim to have been aboard the Mauwau, when he knew nothing whatever about the vessel or her human complement? He might succeed in convincing his rescuers for the time, but his story would be disproved as soon as the schooner reached whatever port she had originally been bound for. As a survivor of the disaster, he would automatically become an object of official interest; and as the names of all aboard the vessel were known in every port in the South Pacific by now, his ignorance would be exposed and his story discredited at once. It was a complete impasse, and in the circumstances he was driven to considering the plea he had temporarily snatched at as a permanent policy. If he could persuade them that he was suffering from loss of memory, at least it would gain him a further respite. The more he thought of it, the more convinced he became that it offered the only possible way out of the dilemma. He realized that it was not going to be easy by any means, but providing he could keep it up, it promised to solve his immediate difficulties. Also, it suggested a margin of safety for the future. By disclaiming all recollection of the past, he would offer the only possible way out of the dilemma.
