

A Servicable Silo.

A Vermont farmer says, in Mirror and Farmer: "I built silo No. 1 last year and silo No. 2 this. Both are in my barn and are built of wood, well timbered and double boarded, with paper between; the boards inside are planed and matched. I used two jack screws to press the ensilage in. I put two press beams overhead to set the screw caps against. My silos are 10x12 feet, and 24 feet deep, extending from the high beams to the bottom of the cellar. The bottom is covered with flat stones and cemented. Capacity, sixty-five tons each. I planted the Southern white flint, Western yellow and small sweet corn. I like the white flint best. Last year I raised fifteen tons per acre; this year but twelve tons; the drought was very severe this year. Last year it cost me to raise the ensilage or fodder seventy cents per ton, and seventy-two cents to cut and put in the silo. This year I planted with my champion seed-drill and used phosphate in the drill; the drill will plant one acre per hour and put in the phosphate at the same time. I do the cultivating with a horse, use a smoothing harrow as soon as the corn is out of the ground for a little time; then run the cultivator as often as necessary, and the weeds will get so discouraged that they won't amount to anything. My ensilage cost to raise this year sixty cents per ton, and to cut and put into the silo $1 per ton, making the cost $1.60 per ton. I consider two tons of ensilage equal to one ton of best timothy hay. I feed at 6 a. m. with hay, about eight pounds to an ordinary animal; at 8 a. m. I turn out and water the animals; then I give twenty-three pounds of ensilage, three pounds of barley straw and two quarts of shorts. I do not feed again till 4 p. m., and then repeat the last named feed. My cattle look well, feel well and are well; the cows give more and better milk, and a better quality of butter is made than when fed on the best hay and meal. I have not fed it to horses. Store pigs do well on it. Two-year-olds will grow fat on ensilage and shorts. I consider ensilage the best and cheapest food for all kinds of farm stock."
