

Hobby Farm Has Become Large Job

CALGARY (CP)—Eight years ago a Calgary eye, ear, nose and throat specialist began cattle raising as a hobby. Now he's so deep he can't get out and soon may have to form a corporation to run the operation.

Dr. J. R. Berry, who still practices in Calgary, started with four purebred Aberdeen Angus cows as "a diversion, a hobby." Now he owns a top-flight herd of 85 head.

"I had to get involved and get my feet wet," Although Dr. Berry modestly says it takes at least 10 years to develop a good herd of purebred cattle, he placed second in his class at the Calgary Stampede Show and is one-third owner of a $7,000 prize-winning bull, Mainliner of Alberta.

The Berry family owns an 800-acre ranch at Aldersyde, 20 miles south of Calgary. Dr. Berry says that to start a purebred herd, one must pick cattle with possibilities for show animals.

"Then comes the task of culling and weeding out until you have a few good animals for the show ring."

"The first asset or necessity for a show animal is that all the wildness is bred out of it. They must be tame and gentle to be able to stand up to a week in stock barns at shows."

"For me breeding has now become a business with all the headaches and difficulties accompanying it. And soon I may have to incorporate."

Dr. Berry, who graduated from the University of Alberta at Edmonton in 1939, will devote all his time to farming when he retires from medicine.
