

A Taste of Sue

By Kimberley Johnston, Contributor

We've all heard the song Let's Talk About Sex... but when was the last time we did it?

Last Thursday, UPEI students were treated to a night with Sue Johanson when the veteran sexpert graced our gym with her sensual savoie faire.

The celebrated talk show host gave a humorous diatribe on how our culture reacts to sex and the effects it has on children... who eventually grow to become university students.

She honed in on how the two sexes react after being told that masturbation is not a socially acceptable practice. She said males just ignore the words of caution and continue their anatomical activities, while females react quite differently. They stop gratifying themselves because they are people pleasers. Oh, the irony.

The favourite guest of David Lettermen also suggested that sex education in high schools does not cover the parts of female reproduction as in-depth as they do for males. She said because of this, women don't really know themselves and are not as comfortable with their bodies.

Tidings of great joy were also brought to those of the male population who are, shall we say, not blessed with great endowments. Johansen happily reported to males that the greatest number of nerve endings in the vagina are at the base, where the penis is inserted and not in the deeper regions.

In fact, she said, men don't even need their little soldiers if they're going to do battle.

"As long as you've got this (a tongue) and these (fingers), you can do it."

As a bonus, Johansen offered up other erogenous zones, like the neck and shoulders, encouraging the males in the audience to think outside the box--so to speak.

And what presentation is complete without a demonstration of technological advances? The hostess with the mostest brought out a variety of toys that parents just prey will not end up on their child's Christmas list. She offered commentary on the pleasure puppets, saying her cast members have tested them out... almost sparing me the mental images that I was afraid I would receive. "The ones they don't want, I take home... And they work." (Shiver)

All things considered, it was a very entertaining and informative presentation. She answered questions posed to her with grace and style. No wonder she was voted the favourite campus speaker. Besides, how many other guest speakers would be willing to demonstrate oral sex on a microphone?

It's great to see Sue hasn't lost her spunk.

Well, you know what I mean.
