CHAPTER THIRTEEN

Part Three

"Do you have to talk so much?"

"From now on I'll always let you have the last word."

"Good," said Helen. "Come to my arms, papa."

"And I did, too," laughed Jimmy, looking straight at Mr. Perkin. "Even though she was in mine, I went into hers."

"Most interesting."

"And if you hire Jimmy back again, we'll name the first baby Comet."

"Well!" said Mr. Perkin. "Well, Jimmy, you come to see me tomorrow. Of course, I'm not promising . . ."

Jimmy looked at Helen and grinned. "You bet you'll have the last word, darling, now and always."

His muffled exclamation swung Sally around. "Oh, Mr. Perkin! How jolly!"

"Have you gone mad, Miss Alliston? Have you forgotten that you are in the uniform of the Comet Airlines?"

"Only until tomorrow, Mr. Perkin, Sally doesn't work for you any more," she crowed. "Sally's gonna be a housewife."

And that was true.

Mike had been unable to wait for everyone to leave. He had caught her up in his arms the moment he reached her and hadn't set her down again until he ran short of breath.

"Mike, how dare you!"

"Look, you don't really think you're fooling me, do you?"

"You have no right to kiss me. You're engaged to marry Helen."

"Yeah, it worked, didn't it? You should have seen the expression on Jimmy's face when I told him about it. And I also saw the expression on your face, darling . . ."

"Mike, you can't love me. You can't. You know how nasty I can be. I won't let you throw yourself away."

"When did you realize you were in love with me?"

"In the park," she began, then stopped as eyes rounded. "Oh, I didn't mean that at all, I am not in love with you. Please leave."

"When we're married I shall beat you," he said pleasantly. "Every time you lie to me I shall beat you."

"Mike, I'm not made of brass."

"See, you didn't say no!"

You bet she hadn't, thought Sally now. Only a fool threw happiness away, and she was not a fool. A housewife she'd be and she'd love it.

"Housewife?" faltered Mr. Perkin. "But surely you can't mean it. Your place is in aviation. Think of the golden days that lie ahead for our industry."

"A housewife."

"Maybe," drawled Mike. "I shan't beat you after all. See you tomorrow, Mr. Perkin? There's a little matter of a raise. After all, the children of Comet Airlines employees can't be permitted to starve!"

Mr. Perkin drew himself up stiffly. "I shall be at your disposal, Captain White. May I congratulate you both?"

"Cross my heart, Mr. Perkin, our first baby will be named Comet!"

The executive chuckled as, arm in arm, they strolled away.

the first time he saw there was someone else in that tree and right in his way. It was Prickly Porky the Porcupine. As long as he remained right where he was there could be no getting past him. Without knowing it he was doing Hooty and Mrs. Hooty an unexpected good turn.

gered. Gray Fox shook his head as if trying to shake the sound of those babies out of his ears. He couldn't. Then, looking up, he caught a glimpse of a big Bird flying to that tree and carrying something. Food, of course. So those babies were real and there was nothing wrong with his ears.

He moved swiftly then straight to the foot of the big tree. It was just as he remembered it; it was easy to climb. Hooty saw him now and swooped at him snapping his bill and hissing but taking care to keep out of reach of the strong white teeth Gray Fox was showing.

"It will be an easy climb," thought Gray Fox. "Those babies should be good eating and now is the time to get them before Mrs. Hooty gets back. Hooty alone can't stop me. I may get scratched some but those little Owls will be worth it."

He started to jump to the lowest branch and changed his mind. For
