FISHERMAN'S LUCK

Successful fishing you will find is patience, skill and luck combined. —Old Mother Nature.

Plunger the Osprey, commonly called Fish Hawk, is a famous fisherman. He lives almost wholly on fish, so of course he has to be a good fisherman. He would starve if he were not. And Plunger doesn't starve. He is always well fed. So is Mrs. Plunger. So are the children until they are old enough to learn to catch fish for themselves. They sometimes go hungry for a while when learning, but they learn all the faster for that. There is nothing like hunger to quicken wits.

Long ago Plunger learned the value of patience in fishing; that without patience few fish will be caught. And long ago he learned the important skill. Both these could be learned and were. But one other thing has an equally important part in fishing. It is luck. Patience and skill alone are not enough. Plunger has proved that more times than he can remember. Luck has given him a catch when and where he least expected it, and luck has spoiled a catch he was sure of.

This morning was a bad morning for his kind of fishing. Because the Merry Little Breeze kept the surface roughened with little waves he couldn't see far enough down in the water to see any fish that might be near enough to the top for him to plunge for them. The only quiet water was where Laughing Brook coming down from the Smiling Pool joined the Big River behind a point of land. The Merry Little Breezes had not yet danced in there to trouble the water.

The only thing wrong there was that two other fishers were there, Longlegs the Heron and Rattles the Kingfisher. Longlegs was standing with his feet in the water and Rattles was perched in a tree overhanging the water where he could look down into it. Plunger much rather would have had that quiet water all to himself. Of course, each of the others felt the same way. Each wished the others would give up and go away. But each, being a good fisherman, was patient.

So Plunger slowly circled overhead looking down into the water, high enough to see clearly far down in deep water yet not so high that he couldn't plunge quickly enough to catch a fish that might be near the surface. He wanted a big fish, the bigger the better if it were not too big for him to lift and carry back to Mrs. Plunger on their nest. Big fish were likely to be in water too deep for Longlegs the Heron to wade in. So it wasn't likely that Longlegs would really interfere by catching the kind of a fish Plunger was looking for. As for that noisy Rattles the Kingfisher, he was too small to catch or swallow a fish much bigger than a Minnow. Plunger scorned such small fish unless he could have a lot of them. So after all, it didn't really matter if the two others were fishing there, or so he thought, and gave all his attention to watching a fish below him.

By and by he saw one. It was a big fish. It was just the right size. It was a fish he would be proud to take home to Mrs. Plunger. He seemed to remain still up there in the air high above that fish. Once he closed his wings and started to plunge, but almost at once spread his wings and checked himself.

"Too deep," he muttered in disappointment. "I couldn't have reached him in time. Yes, sir, he was too deep. I would only have scared him and perhaps some other fish I haven't yet seen."

The fish swam deeper. In a few minutes it disappeared in weeds on the bottom. It was fisherman's luck, bad luck. Plunger wasted no more time watching for that fish. Presently he saw another almost as big. This one was nearer the top, much nearer.

"That fish is mine," thought Plunger and shot down with great claws set to clutch that fish. But just then another fisherman plunged into the water near by. It was Rattles the Kingfisher, and as he came out of the water and flew back to his perch, there was a small fish in his bill. But he had frightened the big fish, and it started away just before Plunger struck the water. He disappeared for an instant. Then he beat his great wings to lift him from the water. His claws were empty. He screamed angrily.

"Fisherman's luck," said Rattles the Kingfisher, and swallowed the little fish he had caught.
