COLLEGE OF ARMS CONCERNED

By HAROLD MORRISON
LONDON (CP) - The Royal College of Arms is reported concerned over lack of "elasticity" in the descriptive qualities of the Canadian flag.
An informant said the college, which regulates heraldic symbols for the Queen, doesn't want to get into a dispute with the Canadian government, but there is disappointment within the royal household body over some aspects of Canadian handling of design procedure.
While college officers declined comment, the informant said the rigid terms in which the new flag has been formally described would make it more difficult to consider minor modifications in the future without legislation and a great deal of heraldic procedure.
The Royal College is headed by Sir Anthony Wagner as Garter Principal King of Arms. It is understood when the Canadian flag design was first prepared, he was consulted by Canadian authorities but that his advice on heraldry was not accepted.
The conclusion reached among officials close to the royal household was political considerations had taken precedence over heraldic qualities in the Canadian flag design and its technical description which had to be considered and recorded at the Royal College.
As regulators of heraldic symbols under the Queen's jurisdiction, the Royal College normally would be consulted whenever changes are to be made in the design of shields, banners and flags. In such cases, the college could provide advice on how the heraldic changes are to be properly described.
This service of providing a technical description of the Canadian flag was available to the Canadian government but the informant said the Canadian administration virtually ignored this service and provided the college with a description which apparently jarred the tradition of what the Royal College considers good heraldry.
The Canadian flag description was said to lack precision in some ways and was over-precise in others. There was insufficient elasticity in the description to provide for possible modifications to take care of changing fashions in future years, the informant said.
