BURGESS STORIES

time, without really knowing what he was doing, he had closed his bill on that Minnow. Now he began to beat his wings frantically. He was frightened. Never before had he been in the water like that. All the time he held onto that little fish. In a second he was out of the water and in the air. All his fright left him then. Up to his former perch he flew. All his brothers and sisters began begging for that little fish. The nearest one tried to snatch it from him. He moved away a little, turned that Minnow so that it would go down his throat head first and swallowed it.

"Catch your own fish," said he, and settled himself on his perch.

Father and Mother each brought a small fish, but of course, these fed only two and the others were hungrier than ever. Father and Mother hurried away to try for more fish. The unfed tousle-heads grew hungrier and more impatient. A school of Minnows, swam under them. Another became suddenly daring and plunged. He missed his Minnow, but he no longer was afraid to dive. The next time he tried he caught his fish.

One after another the others grew bold and tried. Even when they didn't catch a fish, diving into the water was fun. Sometimes Rattles or Mrs. Rattles returning with a small fish would drop it in the water and several would dive for it. It was a jolly fishing party.
