ELLEN'S DIARY

Spice-Scented Bracken Welcomes Dimpled Brooks

Along paths overlaid with the dappled silver of moonlight, this day will go presently. The small wind which stirs lightly the curtain at our window will attend it — a bright happy wind of season, which comes and goes with a whisper of chuckle ... It tells one of dimpled brooks that steal away into spice - scented bracken, of birdlets hatched in low and high nests of field - trails, Island - red which wind along the pastures to stream or to shade; of buttercups salting pietalled cooling feet by a pool; of herds and flocks, and meadows where first daisies bloom.

True an ox - eye daisy is a weed — a plant out of place. But how engaging in moon or in sunlight a fresh company of those are: frilly white - gowned, the hearts of gold inviting by day the bee - call. And all too short, we remember, is the delectable period of summer, through which they last for our pleasure.

"We should be getting the strawberry run of trout now" an angler at the stream offered this evening.

It should be, the thought came, that soon the ruby-red of wild strawberries will be back amidst the ferns of a stumpland!

"Well, well" Papa Starling smiled this morning when we came to spread our pieces of wash, "it's days like this that makes life worth living, isn't it? I've been sitting here by our door, lost in admiration of the countryside and trying to find a word to express adequately the charm now obtaining."

"Beautiful?" we suggested.

He shook his head.

"Not sufficiently expressive" he said.

'Delectable?"

"Not bad" he agreed. "That implies, I always think charm with an added sweetness. But even that is not exactly descriptive."

"Then how about, 'Out of this world!'" we chuckled.

"That is better! It signifies 'beyond description' eh? And who would presume to describe the loveliness of today's earth and sky?" Tablecloths, towels, sheets... so pretty the summer - wash is, that now the housewife spreads.

"What do you say to our taking a walk?" Peter questioned, coming from his sandpile to fit a warm chubby fist into ours. "But first of all wouldn't you like to come to see the kittens? They're" he grinned happily "the cutest ones we've ever had! I don't know!" he confided "which one I like the best!"

"Things are getting dry, Ellen!" James offered in passing, carrying a sod to a company of piglets in a sty. "Yes, we could do with rain. Even a shower would help."

Now at the blowing - out the - light - time there is not a cloud in the sky. The Lady Moon's smile is serene.

As our day was — one quite "out of this world" which on paths overlaid with the dappled silver of moonlight will be, presently, up and away.

Till tomorrow — Diary — Good - night.....

Orphans Become Desirable Brides

VANCOUVER (CP)—An interdenominational Christian mission in India is turning rejected girls into sought-after brides.

It uses the Hindu and Moslem custom of arranged marriages and finds the system works "surprisingly well."

The story of the Ramabai Mukti Mission in India's Poona district near Bombay is told by Lillian Doerksen of Vancouver, back from 14 years as a teacher at the mission.

Poor Hindu women abandon girl children if they can't support them, she says. Mission workers have found children abandoned in ditches moments after birth, buried alive in shallow graves, thrown on public garbage dumps and left by the side of the road.

The babies are taken to the mission, which gives medical aid and sanctuary to 750 to 800 girl orphans and Indian widows. The orphans are given elementary and sometimes high school and university education.

"Our girls are much in demand as wives. Unlike most Indian girls, they are educated, and educated Indian men now are looking for women who have the same literacy skills they do."

The mission arranges marriages, in keeping with local custom, in order to ensure the girls gain security.

"They work out surprisingly well. In India, every well-brought-up girl has her marriage arranged for her."

Men seeking wives must fill in a form giving age, employment and family background.

"We screen them carefully. References are asked for, and the boy, like the girl, must be of the Christian faith."

MARY HAWORTH

Wayward Husband Possibly Using Wife As Good Excuse

Dear Mary Haworth: I am 26, the separated but not divorced mother of two small daughters.

About two months ago I met Bruce, a nice gentleman who is separated from his wife and two young children. I have fallen very much in love with him. He says he loves me more than anything.

A few days ago, however, he said we will have to stop seeing each other. I almost had a nervous breakdown.

He loves his children and misses them very much. The only way he can be with them is to go back to his family. He doesn't want to, and he doesn't think it will last, but he will risk it because of the children. He also loves my children.

If he would get custody of his kids, I will get my divorce and marry him tomorrow. Do you think I should mention this to him?

I don't want to lose him. I love him too much. I have lost all hope of life. I expect to see him this coming weekend and hope to have had your answer by then. Please help me. E.F.

Dear E.F.: I would suppose that Bruce is becoming uneasily aware of your increasing dependency upon him, as somebody to belong to, theoretically, as insurance of sorts against loneliness and feelings of great insecurity.

I gather also that he is trying to warn you, as gently as possible, that you mustn't count on him for marriage. This I think is the overall meaning of his statement that "we will have to stop seeing each other."

It seems probably that Bruce prefers his freedom to marriage with any woman. Hence sees fit to return to his wife (whatever their trouble has been) at least temporarily, with the children as excuse for his vacillation, rather than get legally involved in a new partnership with you, which he assumes wouldn't hold any better than the old.

It isn't uncommon for wayward husbands (who've turned their backs on family) to use the rejected wife as a fence to hide behind — in much the same way as Bruce is doing — when they feel a need, from time to time, to lock the door on some other woman's determined proprietary pursuit of them.

With this my estimate of the situation, I consider it would be uprofitably humiliating for you to entreat Bruce to get custody of his children, while you'd be obtaining a divorce to marry him. If he favored that solution he would suggest it himself and campaign for it.

In any case, you fail to recognize the enormity of your own selfishness in taking for granted it would be okay, if you could bring it off, to deprive Bruce's wife of her children simply that he might have them, so that you could have him.

Are you so unprincipled or so unfeeling, in your conduct of life, as to overlook her rights in relation to her husband and children?

Now for advice: don't mistake your shock - reaction to Bruce's exit - line for tragic heartbreak. What happened, actually, is that an illusion collapsed. You were building him up in imagination as your dream man, and building on sand.

He broke the spell with a statement of fact, to - wit, that he's not available, seriously. So now you are simply back where you were before you began to count on him. In short, your "hope of life" (i.e., of future emotional security) is just as good now as it ever was. But to fulfill that hope, you'll have to find a helpmate endowed with more stability of character than Bruce can muster.

To improve your prospects, tie - in with a stable social group: for example a church members' fellowship, in the young adults' sector. M.H.

U.S. Faces Possible War In Southeast Asia Moves

By MALCOLM W. BROWNE

SAIGON (AP) — The United States appears facing its closest approach to a general war in Asia since the close of hostilities in Korea in 1953.

President Johnson has appointed his highest - ranking soldier to take charge in the hottest of the Asian hot spots—South Viet Nam. Gen. Maxwell D. Taylor knows his way around in these parts, and there is no doubt he is coming primarily to head a war effort that could lead to a head-on collision with Peking or even Moscow.

It seems unlikely Taylor's appointment will result in major immediate changes in the balance and organization of U.S. support efforts here.

Since 1961, the involvement of U.S. manpower in Viet Nam has been overwhelmingly military — especially at the working level, in the field.

With some small anticipated increases, U.S. civilian field workers will number a little more than 200 men and women. Of these, roughly 150 are field representatives of the U.S. aid mission, charged not only with distributing aid locally but with pursuing political, social and educational projects at the rice-roots level.

WORKERS FROM U.S.

Another 50 or so American field workers come from the U.S. Information Agency and the Central Intelligence Agency.

On the military side roughly 10,000 of the 16,000 U.S. servicemen are in the field. Besides advising the Vietnamese in military matters, they work closely with Vietnamese rural officials in civil matters.

Psychological warfare, military intelligence and even some firms of direct civilian aid are handled by military men.

There are no immediate prospects for increasing the number of U.S. servicemen here.

The significance of Taylor's job appears to be in that context. As co-ordinator of the entire American effort here, he could take over instantly a commander of the Vietnamese theatre if a major war should develop.

LEADERSHIP STABLE

South Viet Nam has what appears to be an increasingly stable military dictatorship. Its leader, Maj. - Gen. Nguyen Khanh has promised to hold tight to the reins of power. He has shown an all-out willingness to co-operate with his U.S. allies. Relations between the Saigon government and Washington have not been so good in years.

But the Viet Cong has made steady advances. It has opposed a dangerous new offensive in Laos, and has scored important diplomatic points in neighboring Cambodia. Washington apparently has decided the time for a showdown may be at hand with what it regards as the two biggest trouble makers in Southeast Asia — Communist China and North Viet Nam.

Ranking American and Vietnamese officials have for the time being discounted the idea of a joint Vietnamese-U.S. military command. But Premier Khanh said recently this question would have to be re-examined if the situation changed.

He was talking about a general war. If such a war developed, Khanh and Taylor presumably would become co-commanders.

Taylor comes with the knowledge that Washington probably is willing to go to war even with Communist China itself. This knowledge is likely to end many of the restrictions on U.S. servicemen here.

In a general way, Taylor is expected to serve as over-all commander of a co-ordinated military and civilian establishment, with no clear line of distinction between them.
