He kept his word as he read Robert Burns' poem, "Epitaph to a young friend" (Andrew Allan) and in unexpected explanation and commendation resulted in the second characteristic being achieved in a quite unusual way. It is a slave to vice.

Some of the worthwhile thoughts he presented to the class for consideration and remembrance were these:

Life is rather hard at times. Sometimes one will strive but fall because of things over which he has no control. Avoid criticism of the weak. The world is made up of a variety of individuals and each has an important place. To give of oneself generously may contribute to that to give money. Avoid careless talk and do not take anyone at face value. Keep to yourself. No one is more pitiful than a person who thinks he is free yet is a slave to vice.

What one does is important for him and also for the effect it has on his fellowmen. One can have all kinds of money, yet be poor indeed. Do not try to pile up money but get enough to be independent. Do not let fear be a basis for your goodness. Be good for the sake of virtue itself.

Serve your God and do not be afraid to recognize the existence of a higher power. Religion is not something to wear or to argue about but something to live. It is a most fitting attitude when a man is "down and out" and has nothing to cling to. Follow advice and sever the evil.

In closing he spoke of the present day as an era of unparalleled expansion and prosperity. The world in which we live is a complicated one, he said, it is one that will demand more and
