MARY HAWORTH

Wife Disagrees With Mate On Negro's Social Rights

Dear Mary Haworth: I am married to a fine man, of integrity and compassion. Both of us are college educated and well known in our community, where we serve in church and on civic boards.

We have five wonderful children and have been married over 20 years, not without problems but always with respect for each other.

This letter is about an issue which troubles us both: The issue of civil rights. My husband endorses and will actively support the Negro's right to civic and economic equality, but he firmly draws the line against social mixing. I disagree.

I say that we cannot compartmentalize people, and that to say to the Negro, "You may work beside me, draw the same salary, I will treat you with respect but not with hospitality or friendship" is wrong and degrading.

Now of course my home is his home and I want to honor my husband's convictions (he is a Southerner) but I feel frustrated. If I were to bring a Negro friend home both my husband and our guest would be uncomfortable. So possibly the answer is that simple.

My husband respects and will defend my right to act according to my conviction in every area except this one. He also takes care to explain both sides to our children, for which I am grateful.

My Question: Should I leave

well enough alone, as peace-making instinct urges, or follow the guideline of my conscience? I would appreciate your response, which I suspect may trouble many, as your column is always thoughtful and stimulating. You carry a heavy responsibility, almost a ministry, and you are always mindful of this. Sincerely, A.C.

Dear A.C.: Let's put it this way: When our Lord Jesus Christ chose his apostles, his 12 closest associates, one of whom sold him out, he didn't go about it by saying, "Come, one and all and share my private life." Instead he picked his little band of intimates one by one, on the basis, we may conjecture, of special individual attributes of mind and heart possessed by each, which uniquely drew that person and our Lord together.

And I think that ordinary human beings, searching for guidelines to meaningful friendships in this era of "civil rights" tensions, cannot improve upon our Lord's example.

In dealing rightfully and realistically with human nature and human beings, you aren't dealing with a mass of humanity, or with "classes" of people. You know people, you relate to them significantly, with integrity, only as you get to know the person individually.

Thus in my view, a racial bigot, a person psychologically crippled in his approach to human relationships, is one who involuntarily lets the racially darker color of another person's skin block him from perceiving the reality of the individual selfhood of the person confronting him.

The truly liberated person, in human society, is the one who sees another person's self "as is", with the skin color an incidental artistic detail supplied by the Creator, whose handiwork proclaims that His Majesty glories in the infinite varieties of created differences—beheld as wondrous and beautiful by discerning eyes.

Social forces pressing, justifiably, for long overdue full citizenship status for our Negro populace are confusing the issue if they assume or indicate that full citizenship ever has conferred the unwritten right to belong, automatically, to one's neighbor's inner social circles.

The history of America's other immigrant tides, the Irish, the Southern and Eastern Europeans, etc., gives ample proof that these non-WASP (white Anglo-Saxon Protestant) elements in our national make-up have won their way up the social ladder, to such insider status as they presently exercise, mainly by virtue of certain pace-setting individuals' irresistibly influential personal achievements, and enabled them to bring others along with them.

The built-in tendency in human nature is for persons to clique together, by mutual individual attraction. And the most that full citizenship status can do, to enlarge the individual's social life, is to expand his opportunities to become more fully himself—his better self, as the saying is.—M.H.
