BURGESS BEDTIME STORIES

(By Thornton W. Burgess)

THE HUNTER IN THE DARK

Things not feared much in the light. Terrify when in the night. —Old Mother Nature.

That is why little boys and girls are so often afraid in the dark. Things that do not scare them in the least bit in daylight terrify them after dark. Yet all the time those frightening things are just the same in the darkness of night as in the light of day.

It was so with the Rats and the Mice living in Farmer Brown's big barn. During the day most of them kept well hidden. Only a few of the boldest ventured to run about in the daytime. But at night they were unafraid and ran about as they pleased.

TAKE CARE

Players cannot be held accountable if their bridge experience does not run to coups and squeezes or other extremely advanced plays, but there is one thing that every player can be, and that is careful!

South dealer. Both sides vulnerable.

Bridge hand diagram showing cards in South, West, North, and East hands.

The bidding: South West North East. 1♠ 2♣ 2♦ Pass. 4♥ Pass 5♦ Pass. 6♠ Pass Pass Pass.

South was well justified in bidding the slam after North and later spade raise from North and later discovering, via the Blackboard four notrump, that North had an ace. At the very worst, South figured, he ought to have a trump finesse for his contract, i.e., North would almost surely supply either the trump king or the queen, if not both.

West could see no better lead than hearts, and laid down the king. He followed up with the heart ace, and South naturally ruffed. The precise nature of his ruff, however, was not so important as the carelessly tossed in his spade seven! In a very short time he discovered when he went to dummy via the diamond three to the ace and returned the spade queen, the finesse succeeded, all right, but West showed out! East had not been so big-hearted as to cover the spade queen, and now, on a second lead of trumps, South had to land in his own hand and could not get back to dummy for another vital finesse. Down one!

After the foregoing remarks, it is probably anti-climactic to observe that the South would have brought the slam contract home very easily by ruffing the second trick with the jack, ten or nine of trumps instead of the seven-spot! Then, with the seven still in his hand, he could have kept the lead in dummy long enough to trap East's trump king most securely!

dared stir out of their hiding places after dark. Why. Because for several nights some who had gone out as they had been in the habit of doing had never been seen again, and no one knew what had become of them. Black Pussy the Cat was the only one they ever had had to fear and it usually was in the daytime that Black Pussy visited the barn. Now and then he came hunting in the night but they always knew when he was about. When he caught a Mouse it usually was a young and heedless one. The smart ones had no trouble in keeping out of his way. So it couldn't be Black Pussy who had made it safer to visit the grain bins in daylight than in darkness. No one had seen or heard a strange hunter. It was a mystery more frightening than any known enemy could have been. What was happening? No one knew.

It was Nibbles, the young Mouse who had come over from the woodhouse to live in the barn, who found out that it was a hunter, but such a hunter as he never had heard of and so of course knew nothing about. For two or three days and nights Nibbles had been staying very close to the home nest that he and his pretty mate had made in the haymow. Perhaps I should have said that Mrs. Nibbles had made. He had helped mostly by looking on. They had lived mostly on seeds from the hay. They were getting a little tired of these and wanted a change. They had heard of no new disappearances. Perhaps there was no longer that unknown danger. Nibbles became venturesome. He was sure there must be some grain spilled around the grain bins. He decided to go down and find out.

"Be careful," warned Mrs. Nibbles.

"Of course I'll be careful. I always am careful," squeaked Nibbles.

He was careful. He was very careful. The truth is he was a scared Mouse, and a scared Mouse is always a careful Mouse. He managed to get down to the grain bins without once exposing himself in the open. From between a barrel and the end bin he cautiously peeped out. It wasn't wholly dark. A ray of moonlight came through a small window and lightened the darkness a little in front of the bins. It would have been dim for your eyes and mine, but night-seeing eyes could see clearly there. There was some spilled grain on the floor just as he had been sure there would be. To get it he would have to run out just a little in the open. Twice he started to do this and twice he hesitated. Then, before he could start again, a small Rat darted out from behind another barrel. He was young, not more than half grown, but bigger, much bigger than Nibbles, too big for Nibbles to dare go near him. There was nothing to do but wait until that Rat left.

Then it happened. To the startled Mouse what seemed like a living shadow, for there was no sound, appeared to drop down from high above. For an instant he saw two glaring round eyes, there was a squeal, and the living shadow and the young Rat disappeared in the darkness high above. Nibbles had seen the hunter in the dark.
