ELLEN'S DIARY

Delights Of Season Remind Us 'These Things Are Free'

The night brings us now to week's close. How happy it ends, though we know that while seed-time and harvest remain on farms, the complete story will never be told. Only a chapter is ended. And having read its "All's Well" at the last, we relax in James' old armchair and reflect on the tale.

What a comfortable haven this armchair is! And a preferred seat to the various members of the family. Even wee Alex will run to it with an impish grin and claim it in advance of his grandfather. Then he is satisfied to climb instead of his knee.

James will come to it presently and then like the rest, we shall yield him his right to it. Now after a day's absence at Rob's and the field-work, he and the younger farmer are busy at the choring. A sound of carpentry from a piggy, echoing on the quiet of the overcast night indicates that protective pieces of scantling on behalf of piglets-to-come, are being set in place within a sty. Of late and continuing, our fortunes at Alderlea are being increased in number by the advent of the Fall litters there. And in the yards, the little night wind keens through the baring branches and along paths where the crisp of fallen leaves lie.

So pleasant is the chapter this October week wrote. And all of Autumn scenes spread fetchingly far and wide along the farmlands. We heard and noted them too: call of sojourning wild geese flying high above the colorful woodlands—intriguing dark of wild ducks on wing above the spruces down the river below; hunters crossing the stubbled fields; farmers the buying of a bound, in a potato field, help intent on the pickling or turnip harvesters busy in the odd green of a tidy patch of roots.

And here and there along the countryside, in blessed promise and hope of another Springtime, is to be seen the flash of plowshares and the red sheen of the upturned sod.

And enjoying much every hour, every delight of season, every blessing of this October week written, we remember that to have many of them we need neither script nor purse, that for our such loveliness are free. Dora W. Cairns in her verses in the County Guide "These Things Are Free" writes:

"How glad I am these things are free."

October hues on the maple tree, Wind-chased clouds in a bright blue sky, Foam-tipped billows tossing high, The silver dust of the Milky Way, The laughter of a child at play, The firm handclasp when old friends meet, And hearts are filled with memories sweet.

A baby's cheek so soft and fair, With only a rose it can compare, A rain-drenched lilac-scented night, Pale shadows, yellow candle light, Frost-silvered trees on a winter morn, Wee blushing blossoms new wily born, Dear God, we lift our praise to Thee, That all these lovely things are free."
