Strange But True

By F. H. MacArthur
The outside world will never know just how many human beings have been banished to Siberia, the world's largest and at the same time, most notorious prison.
The men and women are from all walks of life. Bearded patri-archs, beggars, criminals and so on without number.
In the old days it took four years for convicts to reach their destination and many perished enroute bound by their clanking chains.
How were common prisoners treated in Siberian jails? The commander of the whip was master of life and death and upon him depended the prisoner's fate. No law on earth could save the convict who disobeyed orders. Those who survived the toll, sweat and tears of prison life were legged dead, as far as Russia was concerned. No records were kept of them. Indeed it was not until 1823 that a central bureau was set up at Tashkik to keep account of the "dead". Today they are given identification papers.
So late as 1882, Russians were banished to the house of death for any or no reason. Mere friendship with one awaiting trial on a political charge was sufficient grounds for a trip to the Far East. The worst type of criminal ended up in the Kara mines—the worst in Siberia. Non-criminals received better treatment, but many of this latter group were destined to end their days far from their loved ones.
The hard labor convict lost all his civil rights. His property, if he possessed any, descended to his heirs, or to the crown. All ties with his family came to an end. His wife could remarry. To make escape more difficult, one half of the head was shaved and he wore five pound log fetters. In addition to this each prisoner wore a diamond patch between his shoulders, upon which was written his particular crime.
Before the building of the Trans-Siberian railway, the long trek was mostly afoot. The convict convoys travelled about 300 miles a month, not a very fast march. Rest places were established every 30-40 miles along the treacherous, heart-breaking route. And at night they were cooped up in filthy, insect-infested log-houses.
During the second part of his term, the hard-labor convict was granted more freedom; no longer was he confined to jail nor was he chained. If he had the money he could live in a rented cottage or in a part of the barracks tent that had no iron bars. This was all arranged by the official in charge.
But the life of the Siberian exile was not always an unmitigated horror. The cases of Lenin and Stalin, who later reached the pinnacle of fame as the leaders of their country, may serve as an illustration. Because of the corruption of the penal system the country was full of escaped prisoners. Nearly 70 per cent of the exiles had escaped from prison in a few years.
Some were captured, others managed to elude the law and live in peace. It was from this latter group sprang the new generation of revolutionaries.
The New Siberia still has the House of Death, open to all who dare to raise a protesting voice against their government. Yet who can tell what new revolution is being brewed in this far-flung country whose borders reach to nowhere.

Religion and Life

FLESH AND SPIRIT
A woman who had reached the serenity of age once rebuked a neighbor for failing to control his temper. He replied, "I do more to control my temper in one day than you do in a month." Naturally hot-tempered, his whole life was a struggle for self-control. He really wanted to make every element in his nature serve noble ends but did not always succeed. He aspired towards the heights but often stumbled into the depths.
This conflict in human nature has claimed the attention of moralists from early times. Plato, for example illustrates this truth by his figure of the charioteer. Reason, who drives his two winged steeds, Spirit and Appetite, the other of opposite descent and of opposite character." Still another ancient writer compares man's bodily nature with its impulses and self-will to an unruly bullock which drags its team-mate, the soul, into the ditch. Every man knows the grim reality to which they refer.
The most vivid of all descriptions of the two factors in our nature is given us by St. Paul in the 7th chapter of his Epistle to the Romans. He describes it as the contrast and conflict between "the flesh" and "the spirit." There is that in each man which is akin to the lower order of nature and responds to its appeal. There is also an element in each person which is akin to God and aspires to fellowship with Him. But when man is left to himself, the lower overwhelms the higher Paul writes: "I find then the law, that, to me who would do good, evil is present. For I delight in the law of God, after the inward man; but I see a different law in my members, warring against the law of my mind, and bringing me into captivity under the law of sin which is in my members." Who is there among us who does not know of this internal strife?
St. Paul brings a factor out of his own experience which Greek philosophy did not know. He follows the passage just quoted with the exclamation: "Wretched man that I am! Who shall deliver me from the body of this death?" Promptly he replies: "I thank God through Jesus Christ our Lord." Then he goes on to show that what the law could not do, Christ did, and set him free from the law of sin and death. This is the message of the Redeeming God to sinful men—first, forgiveness full and free, and then deliverance from the power of sin. It is a matter of experience, as fresh and real today as ever that Christ "breaks the power of carnal sin and sets the prisoner free." All that is needed is honest repentance and trust on our part.
Every man must decide which of these two factors is to prevail in his own life and life-work. St. Paul and the sages of ancient Greece insist that the first victory must be within. But what the
