Sick of spoon-feeding

Dear Editor,
 Re: Tired...
 To answer "Tired". Your concerns would be heard by the president of the university, the Dean of Science or the chair of the chemistry department. If you had any confidence in what you say you would go directly to the professor that you are talking about.

I've been attending this university for too long now, but it would have seemed forever if everything was spoon-fed. At High school, you are showed everything. At university, you are introduced to everything, including what a future career in a subject would entail.

I may be mistaken, but I believe what your professor was saying was that there is a lot of hard work in chemistry, but it can be very fulfilling.

Who are you to criticize a person whose most enjoyment comes from the success of his students. He wants to promote his field.

It seems to me that you are probably there for a credit and don't care too much about chemistry. There are most likely people in your class that do, and enjoyed the enlightenment. You seem to be a bit selfish in that sense. Perhaps if we had more Profs at this University who brought so much knowledge and experience we wouldn't rate so low on the MacLean's Scale (not that MacLean's matters to our education).

To help you out for this and other courses: ALL you have to do is attend all the classes (I'm sure the full curriculum will be covered), study hard (chemistry isn't a bird), and ask questions (He knows the answers). And if you are still tired get some sleep, the test is coming up.
