OTTAWA (Special) — John A. Macdonald, who includes many saltwater fishermen in his constituency of Kings got a chance to see how the other side lives last week when he inspected fresh-water fishing on Lake Erie. The trip was put on for members of the Commons marine and fisheries committee and included a tour of the huge Olmstead fish processing plant at Wheatley near Windsor, Ont., a visit to the fisheries research vessel and a trip on the lake in tugs to inspect fishing operations. The Olmstead plant, largest of its kind in the world, employs some 600 people at peak periods. Mr. Macdonald said he was highly impressed by the special machines, designed and built by Duane Olmstead, one of seven brothers who operate the plant. These machines can handle the small-sized smelt, scale them and chop off their heads, gut and bone them and hand the fish on to other machines where they are covered with batter and breaded to be boxed and marketed ready to go into the oven. Main purpose of the trip, organized by Harold Danforth, the member for Kent and the Lake Erie fisheries council, was to educate members representing Atlantic and Pacific ridings in the problems and operations of fresh-water fishing.
