

Obedience.

How terribly we are all afraid of that word obedience, ever striving to shake off the yoke God has put upon us.

"Wives obey your husbands; children, obey your parents; servants, obey your masters." "Wives obey your husbands." It is a divine command; it echoes down from age to age, reverberating through the corridors of all time.

Obedience lies at the very root of domestic life; it is the chief corner-stone in the temple. "Children obey your parents," is a Divine injunction, but one which the modern child is unwilling to heed.

The thought of the power and place God has bestowed upon man should not fill him with arrogance and conceit; on the contrary he should ask himself the question, "Who is sufficient for these things?"

Inaccuracy in Conversation.

The tendency of women to exaggerate in conversation, makes them unreliable both as witnesses and relators of facts. Indeed, in narrating what they call 'facts,' we must be prepared to receive the communication with some allowance for the vivid fancy of the speaker.

This spirit of exaggeration which makes the statements of women so unreliable as a general thing, does not proceed from an inherent love of untruth, or a wilful intention to deceive.

Women are apt to be led away by their feelings, and to color judgment more by passion and prejudice than by a calm, cautious view of facts as they are. They "see through a glass darkly," and thus seeing their statements are clouded by error.

They do not pay strict attention to what they hear, and have never trained their minds to deal in facts. They are apt to skim over matters, instead of diving down after the pearl of truth. They deal more with fancy than facts, lacking methodical observations and judgment.

Truth is something well worth attaining, and is attainable by a little trouble and properly disciplining the mind and the tongue. Let every mother, when a young daughter is repeating what purports to be "facts," pin her down to a plain unvarnished tale, stripping it of all exaggerated expressions and embellishments of fancy.

Teach her, too, the proper meaning of words and expressions. Let her understand that it is one thing to be "sick," another "ill." That a person may be "ugly" without being a perfect fright. That a man may be "bad" and yet not be "the worst man in the world;" and that you may be "very cold" and yet not be "frozen to death."

If this system of training the speech is attended to early in life the habit will be acquired by the time maturity is reached of strict veracity in conversation. Things will be represented just as they are and not as they seem to the vivid fancy and careless judgment of the speaker.
