Strange But True

By F. H. MacArthur

Marriage is supposed to make a man and his wife one, but it never has been made clear which one.

Modernized warfare was known 45 centuries ago.

Furnishing provisions for after death journeys was common practice among the ancient Assyrians. Bodies awaiting final disposal were often placed in huge jars, wooden caskets, stone sarcophagi, or ordinary cloth wrappings.

The Assyrian graves of the first millennium B. C. reflected the view that the dead belonged outside the home which they had occupied during their lifetime. In this manner the spirit could stick close to the living and receive from the living the care without which it would be doomed to endless wandering.

A service for the dead was frequently performed by the eldest son of the house. Then the body was placed on a stretcher and borne to the grave, his right-hand resting on a well-filled plate of food to be eaten in the hereafter.

In addition to the plate containing food the body was buried with all the personal belongings of the deceased: ornaments, weapons, favorite vessels. A tiny niche in the wall held an oil lamp, to be left burning after the lid had been closed and the door to the chamber closed forever.

The average youngster today is a pretty wild animal, and is not apt to turn out any better than his parents.

In this fast age a fellow has to be fast on the draw to steal a kiss from a gal before she can be caught in an accomplice in the larceny.

The shortest inaugural address in the history of the United States was George Washington's second. It contained but 134 words.

One-seventh of the home fires in Canada last year started in the kitchen. Many could have been prevented. How? (1) By covering kitchen floor with fire-proof material, particularly around the stove. (2) By not hanging clothes on the back of your stove, (3) defective wiring.

To remove those stubborn stains in bathtubs, dip a cloth in kerosene and rub the eye-offending parts. The original whiteness will return like magic. White woodwork responds favorably to the same treatment.

The natives of the republic of Indonesia are most fond of eating dragonflies. To catch their favorite tidbits they use a slender rod with a wad of sticky gum on its end. This substance attracts the fly and holds him until the air fisherman can pop the insect into a bottle.

Fishing food from the air is a common sight in Indonesia when the harvest is being gathered. Flies flushed by the reapers are enticed to alight on the fisherman's sticky wand or are trapped on the wing by the more ardent fisherman. Later, they are fried in oil and eaten.

The marriage vows of a Malayan couple are awfully simple and simply awful. The Mahomedan priest, makes a brief statement of the union and the bridegroom acknowledges acceptance. Bride and groom then feed each other rice for seven days, the length of the wedding feast.

The bride enters the scene seated on a deck of flowers while guests sprinkle rice in her cupped hands. Seated on a friend's shoulders, the bridegroom enters wearing a nifty costume.

Sometimes the friends of both parties engage in mimic battles and pay mock ransom. These customs go back to the days when men captured their brides with clubs.

Ice that melts in the heat of summer is old-fashioned today. The modern product not only does not melt, but it can be used time and again without melting.

The product is called "snogel". It can be poured into any desired size or shape. And believe it or not, it comes in temperatures between minus 8 and 32 degrees. While it will freeze water and make ice cream, it doesn't freeze meat or cheese. It is a gelatinous substance that holds liquids in colloidal suspension!

Jack Mascol, of Ottawa, has begun work on what he calls his "pioneer home idea", cutting logs into ten inch lengths, he sets 'em in mortar as he would stone.

When finished, the house that Jack built, will be made entirely of cedar logs, whose ends are to be given a coat of varnish. The house will be completed in another month.

teacher and dislike from the children.

"I pretended I didn't notice the awful faces he made, the rubber bands he shot, and all the rest of the old tricks, the first week he came, but one afternoon, there was such an uproar at the back of the room, I couldn't overlook it. Eddie had let loose a half dozen small turtles. I found an uncle in Florida sent them. And then I had an inspiration. Instead of scolding, I professed great interest and admiration for turtles and asked Eddie to fit up a box and bring some to school. He really knew a lot about them and became our guide to turtle-land and a person of importance. I think too, he does a brisk business in turtles. And he's getting along fine."

"So that leaves only Douglas, the Teacher's Pet," said Mrs. Strong.

"Poor Douglas," sighed Miss Allen. "He came to me with a record of perfect attendance and nothing but 'A's'. His name had been published at the top of the list ever since he entered the first grade. As you know, I have always conveniently forgotten to send in a list, and I am happy to hear that there is a raising sentiment against it. Must babies be made aware that his is a competitive rather than a co-operative world? Besides first, over and over again, brands a child as "Teacher's Pet" and as a rule, he is not accepted by the other children. And learning how to play and work with others, is a most important part of any one's education, I think.

"As it happened," concluded Miss Allen, "the list I didn't send in helped me guide Douglas into less than perfection and into class membership. Douglas's mother, at the end of the month, and wanted to know why I didn't have the names published. We got to talking and she told me that Douglas often had bad dreams and woke up screaming. I explained that perhaps she was expecting too much of a small child; that he should play more and not be so worried about his studies. She admitted that perhaps she and her husband were too eager to have him grow up an educated man. They had been too poor to give the other children an education. I assured her that Douglas could still get to college, but that his health and playing with other children came first. We parted
