Ellen's Diary

the beds in an opportune moment while he took over briefly the care of the younger, busy fellow below stairs. "how would you like to live to be a hundred and two? Well, you just might. Somebody is that age today — it said so on the radio!" What a privilege it would be, to come so far on borrowed time! But how vast a colony of friends and loved ones we should wish to have grow old along with us, otherwise we fear this earth would be by far, too lonely!

Jamie already growing up out of his new overalls, was soon away to his classes, whether to work faithfully or as small persons will to idle some of his time away, we can only conjecture. In either event, he continues to take much interest in his school days, and it is easily apparent that he is making what his grandfather on the farm would call "fair-good" progress in his studies. He looks with much anticipation to the time when others will be added to his course, as the years continue. "The older ones do have nice things to learn about," he confided recently, "history and geography, English and French." "Yes, when it comes your turn, do think you will like these?" asked. "Yes" Jamie nodded.

"I know I will!" A handful of half-brown pussy willows was brought home to be tucked in beside an earlier gathering "for mother" drawing nearer now to the home-coming. He was the pleased recipient of a new pair of rubber boots this evening, which in the period of breaking in, has traversed many a rod, and tried the depth of all the thawing streamlets about the yards.

This seasonal and necessary equipment came unexpectedly, by reason of Rob having to make a trip to the city along "yes — a bad road!" to take delivery of an item of improved livestock the farmers' wives at Alderlea have acquired to add glamour and new blood to a flock. "If instead of buying such poultry," James said shortly of the purchase, "you'd buy yourselves a slip of a heifer or—a pig, you'd be making something for your old days." We have found however that in such enterprise, an old train of thought which was born in the dimness of antiquity: "What's mine is mine, and what's mine is my own!" is very likely to obtain. Better we find to dabble in poultry, one line of farming that holds no charm to our farmers.

James chancing to arrive with Paul and the team "to help Rob get some hay from a stack" remained to supper, to the delight of all. And ending this day, a sunset that was beautiful. Spell-bound we watched it spread rose and crimson above the horizon and then like a tired bairn—even as our small ones weary of their play — it came to its rest. Moonlight now, with shadows about the yards and a star in an apple tree on the slope. It is a night of "sweet content" lacking only the step on the threshold, we listen for.

Until tomorrow — Diary—Good-night . . .

RRIP GRIM HARVEST

DIXON, Ill., March 26 —(AP)—Burglars reaped a grim harvest when they looted Harvey L. Basshardt's parked automobile. They abandoned the stolen articles—appropriately — near a cemetery.

Police identified the loot as 19 burial gowns, suits and blankets, owned by a funeral-supplies firm.
