Slow Boat From Marseilles
By Michael Hastings

"His doctors prohibit it. There is lung trouble. Soon after you had left me this evening to go to the docks, they arrived, escorted by M. Henri Frenay, who came to plead their case. As I should so soon be returning to the States, could I give them a passage."

Prinz frowned. So it was the meddling Frenay. In order to give verisimilitude to the fiction of representing a Chicago charity, it had been necessary to contact a few people who were doing work on similar lines. They had approached Frenay, in an ill-advised moment.

Rutter nodded his head. "I know," he said. "Frenay is an abominable nuisance. But he is not without influence, and is useful in his way. Also, he is a chatter." He smiled. "His praise of our aims and activities is an excellent smoke screen."

"So they go with us," said Prinz. "Once we are at sea it should not be difficult to produce an accident. It is a pity about the girl..."

"Do!" cried Rutter, flashing into irritability again. "Do you never see anything? The two will be valuable. They give a more respectable air. Again, suppose that we are intercepted—that our plans fail. Do you not see that the attractive girl and her father will enlist universal sympathy for us?"

FLIGHT

Prinz was awakened by someone shaking him vigorously. He opened his eyes sleepily, closing them again at the first glare of the morning light. The shaking Dr. Rutter was standing beside him, trembling with emotion.

"What is wrong?" Prinz asked, making an effort to marshal his thoughts.

"What is wrong?" cried Rutter. "Are you a madman? You—you!" He gasped and raised his shaking hands into the air. Prinz seriously alarmed, sprang from bed, thrust his feet into slippers and reached for his dressing gown.

Rutter flared at him.

"Why should I be inflicted with a lunatic?" he cried.

"I don't understand," said Prinz, rather softly. He hoped to calm Rutter. Such loss of control could only do harm. At any moment there might be trouble with his eyes.

"That's the trouble. You understand nothing! Why did you not tell me last night that Johansen had been rushed to hospital?"

Prinz relaxed a little.

"Oh, that," he said. "I intended to mention it; but you were tired. I saw no particular urgency..."

"You intended to mention it! You saw no particular urgency!" cried Rutter. "I suppose it would not matter to you if we were all placed under arrest?"

Prinz shook his head.

"I do understand," he said. "It is true that Johansen will not be able to sail. But I obtained another in his place. That is why I was so long."

Your stupidity amazes me," growled Rutter. He put a hand over his eyes, and his face registered pain. The storm of his anger dropped. In a heavy tired voice he said: "Dress as quickly as you can. We will discuss this downstairs."

"Certainly," said Prinz. His reactions were mixed. There was relief that the fury of Rutter's rage was spent; but alarm at the sudden weakness. That eye again. The quicker they could reach their destination and Kurt Eismann could perform the grafting operation the better. "You look ill," he said. "Can you make your way downstairs safely?"

Rutter was still able to muster a little venom.

"I can do very well without you," he said.

"I regret that I am not satisfied," Prinz said stiffly.

"You put it mildly," Rutter told him. He crossed to the door, fumbled for the knob and went out slowly. His steps along the landing were heavy and slow.

Prinz hurried over his toilet, cutting himself slightly as he shaved. That increased his irritation, so that he was in a thoroughly resentful frame of mind by the time he joined Rutter.

"Now," Rutter barked. "Let us get this clear. You knew about this business last night."

"Yes," said Prinz. "I immediately took steps to obtain a new officer. I exercised great care in my selection, and I am sure the man will give satisfaction."

"I see," said Rutter. He was silent for a minute, then he continued. "And having done that, you imagined that you had thought of everything." He sounded bitter. "Will the day ever come when you really do think of everything?"

Prinz was uneasy. Rutter in this caustic mood was every bit as bad as Rutter in a raging temper.

"It did not seem to me that I overlooked..." he began.

"It wouldn't," Rutter snapped. "That would be expecting too much from you. Were you not told that Johansen had been taken to hospital? Did you not realize that the police would know about it? Was it so miraculous that police should visit the ship in order to make inquiries? Zakas did his best, and gave as little information as possible. He kept our names out of it. But the police were hardly satisfied. It is certain that they will be back again."

"I do not see that such details are necessary," said Prinz. "It was a simple matter—Johansen was injured in a brawl ashore. It did not happen on the ship."

Rutter shook his head. "You know so little," he explained. "Do you not understand that every official all over the world is alike. Each one makes up for his own petty position by making his reports as long and important as possible. So every detail must go down."

"Then Zakas should have mentioned the Chicago charity," said Prinz.

"And have them check up? No. Zakas was much smarter than you would have been in his place. He spoke vaguely of awaiting instructions. He believed that the ownership of the 'Connecticut Lass' had changed. He was casual about it; but they made notes just the same."

"I don't see why," Prinz muttered, frowning.
