MARY HAWORTH

Better Check Your Health

Dear Mary Haworth: I love my husband and children, but every one has a breaking point and I think I have reached mine. I have been married 16 years and the first eight years were very happy; made so by love and shared interest in our problems. But now legal separation seems in order, for the children's welfare—though their years of decision are still ahead, when they will need us more than ever.

We have two lovely daughters, loyal to us both; but Hank (my husband) has become so irritable that I can't stand the strain much longer. We were brought up in the church and attend regularly, and only my faith keeps me from insanity.

Hank is a good provider, but not an understanding father; and there is no need for him to carry on like mad, as he does. Our older girl, 15, has been criticized and harassed by him; instead of getting due praise for achievements, until she has a devil-may-care attitude about everything—evident to teachers, friends and me.

NEEDS HELP

The younger girl has more freedom and very little responsibility. She has had some terrifying experiences for one so young; and has changed so much she seems a different person. When her father is at work and I try to punish her for neglecting her duties, she tells him later that I mistreated her.

I would like to get out more with the family; but have to wait for my husband or use public transportation. Is it possible that the men he works for are a wrong influence? His boss believes only in self, and taking care of self; says there's no Supreme Being watching over him. His income is substantial and he spends a good bit of it on liquor and gambling.

I don't want to jeopardize Hank's job, but I do think he needs psychiatric help. This would be available to him at no cost, but I can't persuade him to co-operate. I have tried the Family Service Agency to little avail. Please advise me. I am at the end of the rope. E. P.

PROBLEM CONCEALED

Dear E. P.: I have reorganized and condensed your letter, but still the problem doesn't stand forth. I think this is because you aren't telling the whole story—maybe because you can't see yourself objectively; or possibly because you shrink from admitting your own shortcomings, that add to the tensions of family life.

You say you've tried the Family Service Agency, to little avail. This laconic statement, giving no detail, leads me to surmise that the Family Service Agency probably couldn't get to first base with you, in the matter of penetrating your defences and bringing you around to a changed, comprehending, sagely remedial attitude towards your difficulties—whatever they are.

You probably hoped (and still hope) to find a solution for your miseries, without making any revolutionary change in yourself. Thus, when the Family Service Agency tried tactfully to impart new life to your attitudes—when they failed to produce or perform in terms of your expectations, of doing an outside job, so to speak—you probably just gave them the go-by. As your husband also does, in rejecting psychiatric help.

CHECK PHYSICAL HEALTH

If that's the case, I think you are making a mistake. You, too, need careful, long-term specialist guidance and support, in getting a clear recognition of what's wrong in the family relationship—between the parents, and between parents and children.

At this writing you simply don't know "from nothing" about the pattern of the problems that are driving you crazy. If you knew, you might be able to change the drift; and to create a situation in which your husband would be less irritable, and the children less defiant.

My advice is, give the Family Service Agency another chance. Meanwhile, to be on the safe side about your general health, read Body, Mind and Sugar (Henry Holt publishers) by Dr. E. M. Abrahamson and A.Q. Peset, to discover if blood sugar starvation is playing a part in your demoralization. If so, the corrective diet prescribed by the authors is a miracle-worker. M. H.

ELLEN'S DIARY

They Have Set A Hen - Interested In Results

Inclined to cloud, this day has been. No sunny wind to help dry the wash, though it came in warm from a hill to the south. But lines were spread. One caught sight of them here and there over the fields, gay banners of the housewife, indicative that with her this Monday morning was good. "Lan's sake. Honey, see dem washes a'ready aflutterin'! Is yo-all a slippin' wife-or-somepin?" that was Papa Starling we heard, when we came to spread our few pieces to the day.

Fresh, rested from the weekend, the morning was, the very birds reflecting the sentiment in like's hearts. And how good the day since has been, which brought each to the work of his hands; the men to 'the spreading' counting off with each load, more acreage, spread, the women to the cooking and this and that interest about.

In a clean-up venture this afternoon we tidied the garden-plot, taking to a heap the left-overs of autumn: the vines and sere stalks. And added to it sundry collections of litter collected from orchard and yards about. Then with the children eagerly "piling on wood" we enjoyed there a sizable bonfire this evening.

It was an ideal time for it, the site we chose on the garden-plot a safe one. The light wind and dampish, blew away from the buildings and we had James at his choring to lend us moral support though it was with that reservation which regards outdoor fires with considerable suspicion always.

Brightly the flames licked out in the evening - gray. At length the robins in the old orchard neighboring us went to bed. Lambkins in the meadow near by snuggled close to the ewes. Below in the depth of our valley, doors closed with a hollow echo and a fisherman's car cased out the old mill-road on the opposite slope and labored up the "nip" of hill. A bullfrog by the stream croaked throatily.

Mack face flushed with the heat and the helping imitated him with a smile. . . Dusk was creeping down from the hills tops and up from the dim of the hollow below. The world was coming to its rest. Chickens, we thought whimsically, getting home to roost. "Do you suppose our hen is on her nest?" we offered.

"That's funny" Granddaughter laughed. "To drag in that subject here I mean. You remind me of Jamantha Allen the time Faith her cousin on her own side" came to visit her and Josiah. She said, "how did it go?"

"We had a good visit talkin' about the world's work, and reciprocity, and Woman's suffrage - which we both believed in - and . . . " " . . . has both settin' and layin' " Granddaughter supplied with a young giggle. "I looked in at her a while ago" Mack volunteered. "She was sitting there right content - a smile on her face" he chuckled. "If she keeps at that" Granddaughter laughed "she ought to have good-natured chicks!"

"Will they cluck like she does?" Mack queried with a grin. "The pullets will some day." "But what if she has none?" "She will" Granddaughter said, "there's bound to be some of both sexes" she nodded.

And bound to come day's end, even in the delight of the Maytime!

Until tomorrow - Diary - Goodnight. . . .
