A 1964 CREDIT UNION DAY MESSAGE This We Believe

- Credit unions are associations of people, owned and democratically controlled by their members. Should they cease to be such, they cease to be credit unions.
- Credit unions are essentially thrift associations. They recognize thrift as the wise use of one's resources, which includes credit. They devote themselves to the development of regular thrift programs, to provide their members a greater measure of financial security.
- Credit unions must provide maximum protection for their members' shares, including adequate surety bond coverage and systematic supervision by the auditing committee of their own members. They should have adequate annual examinations as required by law.
- Credit unions provide their members thrift and loan service that is more complete, more convenient, and more thoroughly helpful than they could otherwise obtain. Where possible they should provide insurance to cover the lives of their members to the extent of their loan balances and on all or a portion of their shares — for the benefit and protection of their members' families.
- Credit unions should regard the character of the borrower as the prime security consideration regardless of the amount involved, and the rate of interest should not exceed one percent a month on the unpaid balance, and should be the same on all loans.
- Credit unions should recognize the essential and important place banks and other financial institutions have in our economy. They appreciate the service these institutions render and believe that friendly relations with them is mutually desirable.
- Credit unions should unite with each other to increase their services to their members and fulfill their obligation to bring credit union benefits to all people.
- Credit unions should be ever alert to changing conditions and should adapt themselves to the changing needs and desires of their members, while they always maintain their basic integrity and principles.
- Credit unions should be responsible organizations in their communities and fulfill their civic obligations in a generous and exemplary manner.
- Credit unions have demonstrated that average people can operate their own financial institutions. Credit unions are increasingly recognized as instruments of human well-being, and will continue to be so long as they maintain and cultivate the highest ideals and standards of conduct.
