MARY HAWORTH

Wife's Poise Shattered By Shocking Discovery

Dear Mary Haworth: I have been reading many articles about unfaithful husbands in the magazines recently. Almost always they say a woman never forgets, though she may forgive.

It was about a year ago, when my husband was ill with a heart attack, hospitalized in another town, that I first learned of his infidfelity. Shaken with hurt, humiliation and anger, I kept the discovery bottled up inside, as I felt we couldn't discuss it then.

Months later, when I tried to talk it out, he said only that he preferred to "forget all unpleasant things." So the subject was dropped. But terrible waves of humiliation still engulf me, though I am a Christian person and try to be understanding.

We have been married 20 years and looking back, I suppose there were always other women, during his out-of-town trips on business. But if there were signs, I thought little about them.

I was anything but a frigid wife, whereas he seemed sexually indifferent most of the time and subtly discouraged my ardor by speaking disparagingly of "over-sexed" women, thus making me ashamed of my perfectly normal feelings.

However, I thought I had at least one good thing in our marriage— namely, his loyalty,love and fidelity. Now I suspect I've been hardly more than a sutstitute mother. He idolized his father and hates his mother, saying she drove his dad to suicide. But his sister says the father was alcoholic, depressed, leaned on "pain killer" drugs supplied by his doctor brothers, and that their mother did her best with him.

I am 50, with no desire to face the world on my own, but I must keep my self-respect. My husband is back on the road, on his traveling rounds.

I have done what all neglected wives are advised to do — gone out to help others, been useful to my church, loved my grandchildren, cultivated a hobby within our means. But where do I go from here?—I.C.

Dear I.C.: Your suffering is disproportionate to the problem. Actually nothing has changed in your life, only your viewpoint has changed, since you finally opened your eyes to your husband's longtime philandering bias.

In the back of your mind, likely you've always known, or at any rate harbored a strong surmise, that he was playing around in an essentially trifling way, when out of your sight.

As a woman poet (was it Sara Teasdale) has written. "Never think she loves him wholly, never believe her love is blind. All his faults are locked securely in a closet of her mind..."

I will wager that was pretty much your philosophic accommodation to the deficiency aspects of your husband's character, up to the time you entered the hospital situation, following his heart attack, to find daily love letters coming to him from a woman who signed herself "Your honey," according to your letter, here condensed. These letters were scanned by you and you haven't recovered yet.

Recovered from what? Well, from a shock which leads you to wonder if you've been missing something vital, wonderful and special in relation to him, that you might have shared as his wife, had you acted differently.

To compound your fret on that score, he keeps his own counsel, refusing to admit, deny, explain or confide anything. Which signifies that you still matter greatly to him. He wouldn't have you know him as he thinks he is.

Due to his traumatic childhood, he isn't geared for confident trustful self- giving, such as makes joyous tender intimacy possible, from start to finish of a wholesome marriage. Hence he shies away from this potential in you, feeling unequal to it. But to boost his ego he makes-believe he is fully capable, in his sterile romances far afield.

All of which is to say, stop glooming. Settle back as you were before, in quiet pursuit of your do-gooder routine, keeping a light in the window for his homecomings.—M.H.

Here's How To Prepare Good Potato Croquettes

"POTATO croquettes seem to have almost disappeared from the Canadian menu!" exclaimed the Chef. "Is it because they are avoiding deep-fried foods?

"Potato croquettes are a favorite accompaniment to meat in many plush restaurants, which shows they are still poopular."

"Many homemakers do not know how to prepare them," Chef," I replied. "Some are avoiding deep-fried foods, pan-frying them instead. However, this is a mistake, ffor pan-fried foods absorb one-third more fat than when deep-fried.

"Others still think of potato croquettes as large in size. Actually, they are more crunchily delicious when made small.

"They must always be rolled in egg-wash, then rolled in fine dry bread crumbs to make an even coating. When slipped into deep fat at the right temperature, the egg--crumb coating cooks firm at once, encasing the potato and preventing the absorption of fat."

Measurements level; recipes for 6.

1 egg yolk
1-16 tsp. cayenne
1-16 tsp. nutmeg
1 tbsp. minced parsley
1 tsp. onion juice
Egg-wash (follows)
1½ cup fine dry bread crumbs
Vegetable oil for deep frying

Combine first 6 ingredients; beat thoroughly. Shape into balls containing 1 tbsp. each. Chill.

Roll in egg-wash, then roll tightly in crumbs. Let stand 10 min. to set co ting.

Fry in deep fat hot enough to brown a bit of bread in 40 sec., 75 degrees F. Drain on crumpled paper towels.

Makes 8 to 12.
