No One Lives In Territory Claimed By China, India
 By HENRY S. BRADSHAW NEW DELHI (AP) - At the heart of the India-China border conflict is a place where nobody lives. Because nobody has ever lived there, historians are vague on who owns it.
 The place is eastern Ladakh, highest and blonkest terrain in the world.
 Lying behind the Himalayas, the area includes part of the world's second highest mountain range, the Karakoram.
 The Chinese cease-fire proclamation that halted the undeclared war with India Nov. 21 said Communist troops would "withdraw to positions 12 1/2 miles behind the line of actual control which existed between China and India on Nov. 7, 1959."
 Where this line was a disputed point.
 The Chinese version of the line would give Peking 2,000 square miles captured since Oct. 20 as well as tacitly grant the Chinese control of another 12,000 square miles.
PAKISTAN CLAIMS, TOO
 The Ladakh region is part of Kashmir state, disputed between India and Pakistan since 1947. Most of it lies on the Indian-controlled side of the United Nations cease-fire line separating India and Pakistan in Kashmir.
 The region in dispute between India and China is almost three miles high in the desert - like
