British Vote Counting System Causes Some Delay In Returns

By JOSEPH MacSWEEN

LONDON (CP)—Urban constituencies will declare their results Thursday night following the British general election but many rural areas will wait until the next day.

That's because Britain's counting system differs from Canada's. Counting begins here only after all ballot boxes in a constituency have been collected to a central place. There are no progressive reports from the polls as in Canada.

Returning officers estimate that more than 400 constituencies will count their votes Thursday night and early Friday morning.

Britain's 630 constituencies are generally known as "boroughs" or "counties," to denote urban or rural respectively. In Scotland, however, the boroughs are known as "burghs."

London has 42 boroughs and the rest of England has 247 boroughs and 222 counties. Wales has 10 boroughs and 26 counties while Scotland has 32 burghs and 39 counties. Northern Ireland has 12 constituencies.

FIRST TO REPORT

Billericay, Essex, was the first constituency to report in the last general election in 1959, giving the Tories a 5,000 majority.

Billericay aims to be the first again Thursday and some observers think it will provide a valuable pointer for the election as a whole.

Although all constituencies are being contested, the record of general elections indicates that the number changing hands will be comparatively small.

In the last election in 1959 only 35 changed out of the 630 as the Conservatives retained power. Even in 1945, a landslide year when Labor won, only 227 seats changed hands out of 640, little fore than one-third.

The electoral system is slightly biased in favor of the Conservatives — not deliberately, but because the population happens to be distributed in a way that produces extreme concentrations of Labor strength in some areas. Labor tends to "waste" more votes than the Tories by piling up huge majorities in those areas.

Normally, results on election night should be available about 10 p.m. London time and by 2:30 a.m. Friday nearly 400 constituencies should have reported. By that time the result of the election should be clear—unless it is extremely close.

Main Purpose Of Visit Mostly Ignored In Que.

By JANES NELSON

QUEBEC (CP) — It will probably be years before the Queen's visit to this usually hospitable city is forgotten, especially among politicians.

Foreign reporters covering the royal tour are writing that Canada has been shamed in the eyes of the world. British reporters say it was a triumph for the Queen. U.S. reporters are laughing at Quebec's separatist movement.

The streets of this old walled city, swarming Saturday with police, armed forces, squad cars and so-called civil protection vans, were all but deserted Sunday. At the service of morning prayer in the Anglican cathedral, special prayers for the Queen's continued safety and safe return to England were read.

The intended purpose of the royal visit was virtually ignored. It was to mark the 100th anniversary Saturday of agreement by the Fathers of Confederation on a resolution favoring a federal union of the Maritime provinces, Quebec and Ontario.

Premier Lesage and the Queen referred to the centenary in their speeches at the legislature, but the visit's main ceremony was the celebrating of the 300th anniversary of the founding of the Royal 22nd Regiment. There was no event marking the beginnings of Confederation.

REACTION EXPECTED

Political reporters expect bitter reaction in the House of Commons at Ottawa and among Quebec political leaders. Opposition Leader Diefenbaker had asked whether the federal government would call off the visit to Quebec because of the threats to the Queen.

This royal visit, to Quebec at least, may be the last, at least for a long time to come, after royal family connections dating from pre-Victorian days. Queen Victoria's father, as Duke of Kent, lived at nearby Montmorency for five years—with a French baroness he later had to renounce so he could marry.

Quebec took the Queen's parents, King George VI and Queen Mother Elizabeth, to its heart in 1939. It did the same with the Queen as a Princess Elizabeth in 1951, and again in 1959 as constitutional Queen of Canada.

But this time as Queen of Canada, flying her personal royal cypher superimposed on the Canadian shield, the population of the city turned out only in small numbers.

In the city's heart, only one major building apart from the legislature—Price House, headquarters of a paper making firm—was decorated with flags.

But if the Queen's visit could not be counted a resounding success beyond the fact she completed it safely, the anti royalist demonstrations could not be counted as a great victory for the separatists, either.

The demonstrations were led by a hardy band of youths who tried to whip up the small crowds into enthusiasm for their cause. The crowds for the most part stood silently by and municipal police stepped in to break up the demonstrations.
