ONE CHANCE ONLY!

Well, I have done all I can, and I think he is over the worst stages of the disease, BUT, said the DOCTOR, you know the greatest danger comes from the weak condition in which the Grip has left him. However, there is ONE CHANCE MORE,—try Ale and Beef Peptonized. It is a wonderful stimulating nutritive Tonic and Food, and has never failed me yet. Send around quick; it can be got at any DRUG STORE.

World's Columbian Exposition,
Chicago, 1893.

THE Government of the Dominion of Canada has accepted the invitation of the Government of the United States to take part in the World's Columbian Exposition, to be held in Chicago from May 1st to 31st October, 1893. As it is important that a very full display of Canadian products be made on that occasion, a general invitation is extended to Canadian producers and manufacturers in agriculture, horticulture, or other lines of industry, to exhibit their products at the exhibition, and to assist in bringing together such a display of the natural resources and industrial products of Canada as will be a credit to the country.

An Executive Commissioner for Canada has been appointed, who will have the general charge of the exhibits and the allotment of space, and the several Provincial Governments have been invited to co-operate with the view of making the exhibition as complete and satisfactory as possible.

The Dominion Government will pay the transport of exhibits going and returning, and for the packing of articles sent.

Entries must be made not later than 31st July. The receipt of articles at the Exhibition buildings will commence 1st November, 1892, and all exhibits, except Live Stock, must be in place by 1st April, 1893.

Forms of application for space and general information can be obtained on applying by letter, post free, to the undersigned.

DOMINION PARLIAMENT.

Sir John Thompson's Able Speech

In Reply to "Blue Ruin" Cartwright.

In the House of Commons, on the 28th ult., Sir Richard Cartwright, speaking to the motion to go into committee of supply, made an exceedingly bitter speech, venomously attacking the Government, and the whole electorate, as well as having an imputation flung at things generally. He was ably replied to by Sir John Thompson, who spoke calmly and deliberately, and whose incisive utterances were received with applause. We have much pleasure in publishing Sir John's speech in THE EXAMINER. It will well repay a careful perusal.

First John Thompson.—I find I must detain the House from going into committee of supply and ask you for a few moments not to leave the chair, not at all because the speech we have just listened to contained anything new or true, but because I have certain obligations to express to the hon. gentleman who delivered it which may be better more fervently now than if time were allowed to elapse. When the hon. gentleman was good enough this afternoon to intimate that he desired very much that I should be present when he delivered himself as he has done this evening, and that he had forborne for a long time from staying the other business of the House in order that, in the full House and in my presence, he might utter that long preserved, not to say kiln-dried specimen which he has given this evening, I asked one of my friends what it could possibly be that engaged the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) so earnestly and made him so anxious at the closing hours of the session, and when we at last, if not he and his friends, feel ourselves somewhat overtaxed with the exertion necessary to bring the deliberations of parliament to a close, to deliver himself of a great speech at such a period of the session as this. My friend told me that probably the question would be the old one with him, that in all probability he would say nothing new, that probably he had said all this before, but that, in ransacking his speeches of the past, he had found that there was some adjective which he had missed, and he wanted to get it before the House. As far as I am concerned I am gratified that the hon. gentleman has been favored with the opportunity, although I feel that he has not even found the new adjective, and we have heard the old one attacked and the old one investigated which has caused this House and the electorate of this country so often to listen to the hon. gentleman with disgust and to regard his name with disdain, though we have had to listen to this on the eve of a patriotic occasion like the first of July, to which the hon. gentleman made allusion at the close of his remarks. I am deeply indebted personally to the hon. member for having waited to deliver these observations until he was present, because it appears to me to be the subject of many of them, but apart from that it was a great delight to me to sit here for an hour and a half and hear the hon. gentleman, with eye and finger pointed to his supporters, lecturing them on political corruption, and to see how they took it without a murmur or a cheer, and to see how the stricken countenances of his followers showed mirrored misery he showed in his. I am deeply indebted for another thing, and that is for the picture which the hon. member presented to us, if not in new tones and colors, at least in faithful and living portraiture, of the faithless Minister, the corrupt politician, the scheming scoundrel-monger, who goes abroad through this country, and the man who, when himself in office, robbed the treasury for the purpose of political prostitution, lent the money to the public banks without interest in order that he might get through the by-way of the country and bribe the electors to keep him in office. I am obliged to the hon. gentleman for that portraiture, because I know that a great author has said: "Never does a man portray his own character so vividly as in his manner of portraying another." I am obliged to the hon. gentleman for the kindness which he showed to myself, for the care he says he exercised over my tottering footsteps when I entered public life. When I entered public life in this arena, my steps may have been tottering, but, although I did not soon know the hon. gentleman, I had learnt of him in history as being one of the most miserable totterers that ever crossed the stage of public life in Canada. I am much obliged to the hon. gentleman further for not allowing parliament to separate, after a session of nearly five months, without his giving us another of those war, famine and pestilence speeches which have so often carried the country for the Government. I am obliged to him, when, in reiteration of the denunciations of his country and his countrymen all over Canada, he appealed for support to an authority, he appealed for corroboration to somebody, and adopted the style of an authority on commerce which is generally known as Pork and Bacon. I am much obliged to the hon. gentleman that on the eve of a patriotic occasion such as the celebration of the natal day of this country he has laid aside the mask, even if only for a few hours, and if, when Friday shall have come, the hon. gentleman will kindly smile with satisfaction, we at least, shall have upon the Board the record that here, within less than 48 hours of the dawn of the natal day of this country, the honorable member declared from his place in parliament, the most public place in Canada, that resistance was lawful to a Government like this, and that men were going about the streets asking how long this country ought to be allowed to stand. Sir, it is gratifying for us to know that he has laid aside the mask, even if only for to-night, and though he may have masqueraded in other disguises on Friday next, at least the country and the House will have taken the weight of the hon. gentleman, and will have realized, as we all have done, and as the country has done, that the traitor is generally the truckling corruptionist as well. Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman paid me a very high compliment. The honorable gentleman, after denouncing his party as guilty of every legislative and electoral crime that a party could be guilty of, turned at last, almost for the first time in the course of an hour's harangue, and pointing at me declared that I had shown an intimate knowledge of criminal law and had no doubt been a successful defender of dangerous criminals. Sir, I decline the hon. gentleman's brief.

Sir Richard Cartwright.—You must have the fee first.

Sir John Thompson.—I have had some experience, both in defending criminals and in prosecuting them; I have never shrank in my calling as a member of the bar, from any man's case, no matter how desperate it might be for the purpose of saving for him what he might lawfully say for himself; but I have sometimes spurned the fee of a blatant scoundrel who denounced everybody else in the world and was himself the most insatiable savage of them all. I doubt that the gratitude with which I listened to the hon. gentleman's address will be shared by his followers; I doubt that they will consider that the occasion was the most timely the hon. gentleman could have chosen. They will think that the hon. gentleman might have got off his address at one of the earlier stages of the business of the House, when he forbore to intrude himself upon the attention of Parliament. I think they will recall this evening the sad fact for them that he, by his personal influence, by the power of his language, by the force of his invective, and by his close criticism of public affairs of this country, has reduced their ranks by 50 per cent since we met last; and they will recall the fact that not only did every constituency which he addressed give a verdict against them, but that every city, town and hamlet in his own country which he addressed, gave a rolling majority against his party; and they will recall the fact that he chose to stay away when they were celebrating another defeat by the wresting of another constituency almost within sound of my voice, by the Liberal-Conservative party from the hands in which it fell at the general election. Now, if I cannot elicit from the hon. member the gratitude which I feel towards him, I can at least do this for the purpose of showing my personal gratitude; although the hon. gentleman supposes, I fancy, that he has reflected upon me, that he has even attacked, and that, perhaps, he has made me feel badly for a moment, notwithstanding that I, as a member of the Liberal-Conservative party, owe him such a debt of gratitude that it is all necessary to reiterate to him the gratitude of the majority of the people of this country, there is no fear and no alarm. Confident of the position which this country has obtained in spite of the efforts of the hon. member for South Oxford, confident in the path that she has chosen for herself, they are not to be alarmed even by the threats of a leading public man who counsels resistance, and declares that the fate of his country is sealed; because they know as well as we know that when the hon. gentleman talks of resistance and the death of his country and all that kind of stuff his courage is all in his tongue and that the motto which he carries upon his escutcheon is "words, not deeds." Sir, the hon. gentleman has made an allusion to me which I may refer to while it is in my memory. Having stigmatized his own party to whom he was pointing and whom he was addressing, with every crime of the political calendar and many in the moral calendar as well, having reminded them of the sad fact that by polluting certain constituencies of this country with stolen money this assembly was hardly to be regarded as a representative body, the hon. gentleman proceeded to attack the judges of this country. I have no doubt that the hon. gentleman has good cause for quarrel with the judges. The hon. gentleman has the same cause for quarrel with the judges of the country that the culprit has for the last while smacked his back. The judges of the country have found him and his party, while their mouths were full of virtue, guilty of every degrading crime which the electoral law punishes and declares to be a fraud, and have unseated in this parliament upwards of twenty of his supporters; and the constituencies to the number of sixteen, taking advantage of the fact, in his own province and in the province of Quebec, have reversed the vote and repented of the support which they gave the hon. gentleman less than two years ago. But the hon. gentleman having his quarrel with the judges, thought he might drag me into the quarrel, too, and declared that, forsooth, the judges were not fit people to try cases because they were not impartial. The hon. gentleman is the only kind of man who ought to try a case, and above all is the only kind of judge who should sit on the trial of a political opponent. He is so proud, he is so above reproach, he is so well known outside of his own province, which those unfortunate judges who are appointed are not, that he above all others made in the same mould—which, thank God, nature broke when she cast him—was fit to sit in judgment in cases whether political or civil in this country.
