ELLEN'S DIARY

Today We Plant Bulbs For Spring Flowerings

"Farmers can't afford to be stupid, can they?" Peter queried this afternoon, after a silence "They surely can't!" we agreed.

"They have to keep so many things in mind at the same time, haven't they? If they're baling straw, they have to think too of little pigs coming, and calves, and everything."

"Everything" we agreed. "There's no mistake" he offered soberly, "a farmer's mind must be full to the top!"

We were spading a length of the perennial flower border then, which had been left undisturbed for some years. It was rich in seedlings inspring to transplant, and it also had given us its flowerings, though in a untidy display. Now we were cleaning and widening it to include plantings of spring flowering bulbs. Ably assisted by the two schoolboys on holiday, our plan was taking shape. Naturally there came pauses-stops to examine an over-size angle worm, and to wonder if the June-bugs unearthed too would be frozen this winter. We stopped, too to listen to the woodpecker tapping on a tree in the neighborhood. And we talked of the annuals we should plant here, when the flowerings of tulips and suchlike were gone.

"We should plant calendulas" Peter said, noting those, in a flowerbed, catching brightly the sunshine. "And I'd say bachelor's buttons."

"With, I think" Alex decided dreamily, "white alyssum along the edge of the border."

The sun set jewels in the stream in the low of the valley, pointing the ripples with gems. There where the blossoming of wild-asters are about gone and the reeds turning serene, the autumn colors in some of the other leafy trees, made bright spots amid the dark of the alders. Pleasant, the afternoon was, neither hot nor cold, but comfortable for such pastimes outdoors.

"Let's not hurry. It's so nice here. We won't try to get it planted today" Alex said.

Close by an acorn fell, to be a plaything for the dark kitten, in the neighboring fallen leaves.

"I see the baler has moved to another field - one across the road" their mother called across the yard.

"A few more moves and the baling will be over" we commented.

"And then will come the plowing" Alex said. "I like to see that."

"I do too", Peter smiled. "And sometimes then, remember? white gulls come up from the River to the field being plowed - dozens of them."

"After food: seeds and bugs. And it's likely grit" Alex said. Suppers come now in the lamp light, when the day's fieldwork is done. Bedtime comes early. James in his armchair speaks of it now.

"I'd better wind up our affairs, Ellen" he smiles. "You know, even with the longer nights, the morning soon comes. Let's call this a day!"

Until tomorrow --- Diary --- Good-night.

Mrs. Jenkins chose for her daughter's wedding a two-piece dress of beige metallic crepe with cranberry and black accessories. Her corsage was of red roses. Mrs. MacDonald, mother of the groom, wore a green wool dress with brown accessories. Her corsage was of yellow roses.
